Oregon One of Nine States Designated For Participation in Wildlife Research Launched by U. S. Biological Survey

With the signing of an agreement by state agencies in Ohio, nine states are now cooperating with the U. S. bureau of biological survey in investigations to learn how to increase, maintain and use wild life resources, and to show on trial areas how facts found in research can be applied in a practical manner. In addition to Ohio the cooperating states are Alabama, Connecticut, Iowa, Maine, Oregon, Texas, Utah and Virginia.

Several other states sought to take part in the research program, but available funds limited the quota to nine. These were selected with a view to carrying on research on a regional basis with as little duplication as practicable. Each state program is arranged so that the practical information obtained may be applied in a large area.

Advisory committees of representatives of the biological survey, land grant colleges, and state game departments administer the work and funds. Project leaders selected by the bureau and states direct the active work at the land grant colleges.

System Lacking "Each year the money paid to trappers, and that spent by sportsmen and others directly interested in wild life, runs well over a half billion dollars," says Dr. W. B. Bell, chief of the division of wild life research of the bureau. "Yet very little has been done. We say 'to systematize this industry through careful management. It is the ultimate aim in this research program to find out not only what can be done to produce more wild life, but how it can be done on a practical land use basis."

One or more trial demonstration areas are being set up at each station in order to work out a complete life history and management practice for one or more particular fur, game or other wild life species. Most of these areas will be established on land of private owners cooperating with the research projects and in state and national forests. Summaries of the state programs may be obtained by writing the bureau for Leaflet BS-38.

Funds to maintain the research stations come from the biological survey, the American Wild Life Institute, the colleges and game departments of states in which the stations are located.
