er's horses. Giving chase on foot, he found them high up in a meadow on the side of the Steins, along with the Indians' ponies. He mounted one of his own horses back, and started bawling the whole band back, taking along the Indian ponies, so their owners couldn't give chase.

NIGHT came and he camped on the flat, and at the break of dawn he looked back and saw the Indians coming over the rim on foot. As the advancing redskins dropped behind a rise, he laid a quick ambush in the depression, piling up the breastwork of lava blocks. As the Indians came within range, he opened fire.

Telling of it afterward, he said: "Fourteen of 'em were in sight when I started shooting. Two got away, and one of them was crippled."

OVER near the base of the Steins, in the far away days when the Indians were on the loose, a wandering band of Plute warriors jumped a lone cabin whose occupants, a man and a boy, put up a determined fight as long as their ammunition lasted, then sought to creep away to the concealing widows along the creek.

The reds discovered them, shot their legs full of arrows, dragged them back into the cabin, set the cabin on fire and burned them to death. A more incident, in those days.

A SON and brother of those pitiful victims still lives in the wide open spaces of southeastern Oregon. He has been busy through the long years since that tragic day.

A dozen years or so back, Joe saw him in Burns. "How many scalps you got now, Rye?" he asked. "Oh, 50 or 60," was the answer. "Come out to the ranch some time and we'll count 'em."

Those 50 or 60 scalps of Indians represented vengeance over the long years for the father and brother who were shot full of arrows and then burned in their cabin at the foot of the Steins on that fateful day of the long ago.

HO HUM. Eleven o'clock. The mahogany wood fire has burned to glowing coals. And it MIGHT rain tomorrow and start the deer on their way to the lowlands. Time to hit the hay.

From the time above camp comes the high, shrill yapping of a coyote. There have been chances of vast impact since those distant days on the plains of southeastern Oregon. But still the coyotes point their noses at the moon and sing their mournful song.

Some things do not change.
