POET'S CORNER

FALL
By George B. Shayer
The warm sunshine has hidden the North adieu
And gone for one long year—
On the eve she left I sat alone
Downcast and most forlorn.
But the zephyrs whispered in my ear,
We will meet where wild flowers bloom
In the sunny south
You and I may roam
And laugh while North winds moan.

Then she read this page aloud to me,
See those autumn leaves come down,
They'll be ground to dust and left in waste
From the tread of the North wind's pack.
Can you see the hills, where flowers were?
They, too, have gone for the year
So why, may I ask, would you tarry here?
And dream—of the sunny south.

Then a wild reckless wail assailed my door,
'Twas the North wind's wintry blast
And the leafless maples swayed and bent,
But they'll yet stand guard the year,
And as I view them from my door,
Like them, I will take life's tests
And stay where the North wind shifts the dust—and the hills—
Where the wild flowers were.

There God will spread a snow white veil,
A veil I may gaze upon,
And see through the folds a vision dim.
Yes, dim is the sunny South.
