Reduction of Crop Acreage to Achieve Parity Income for Farmers Regarded as Possibility By U. S. Economics Bureau

Four yardsticks—domestic consumption, foreign demand, soil conservation and farm income—for measuring future farm production are set forth by the bureau of agricultural economics in a bulletin published by the U. S. department of agriculture, entitled "The Farmer Looks Ahead."

As to domestic consumption, the bureau says that a population of 120 million persons, forecast as the average for the next five years, would require about 265 million acres of harvested cropland to provide the same amount of food and fiber per person as in 1920-29.

"In addition we shall need feed for slightly less than 14 million head of work stock used in producing for the domestic market. Allowing 2 acres of grain and 1 acre of hay per head, slightly more than 40 million acres would be needed. That puts the total up to 305 million acres."

To meet these requirements, the United States has a farm plant of about 365 million acres. "Thus we have 60 million acres of cropland we apparently do not need for domestic purposes." The bureau then asks the question: "Can we hope to sell the products of 60 million acres in foreign markets during the next few years?"

Exports Below Normal

Several forces are working toward increased foreign trade for American farmers, but "we cannot look for great advances in exports. At present we are exporting at about two-thirds the rate that we exported during the 1920-34 five-year period. In 1930-31 we used about 10 million to 15 million acres for export purposes, including feed for work animals used in producing export crops. Adding this estimate to our estimate of domestic requirements, we get about 345 to 350 million acres. Thus, even making all possible allowance for the foreign market, we still have a farm plant that is 15 to 20 million acres larger than we need in the United States."

As to the yardstick of soil conservation, the bureau says that on the basis of an estimate of 15 million to 20 million acres of farm land under plow not needed under present demand conditions, "about 30 to 40 million acres of cropland can be shifted from soil-depleting to soil-conserving crops and still leave plenty of margin for domestic consumption and exports, since an acre of hay will produce about half as much food as an acre of corn or wheat. This a shift of 20 to 30 million acres (needed from the standpoint of soil conservation) would not cut production below prospective requirements."

May Cut Crop Acreage

As to the yardstick of farm income, "to achieve parity income in the next few years farmers may need to reduce crop acreage by as much as 45 to 55 million acres below the 1928-32 average. That is, as few as 310 to 320 million acres of cropland producing at average yields would meet nearly parity income to farmers. The greatest reduction would be in acreage of export crops, mainly wheat, corn and cotton."

The bureau then puts the question: "Do we want to reduce production as much as this?" and answers that "when industrial output is low, farm income can almost certainly be increased by reducing production. We know that from experience. But there is a level below which it is not to the interest of society or of farmers themselves to reduce farm output. Sharp price rises caused by such a drastic reduction might result in decreased consumption, which in the long run would hurt farmers. . . . If the national income is lower, farmers' income is expected, parity income might be reached with much less reduction in crop acreage. And if foreign demand increases faster than is expected, the reduction required would also be less."

ROSE FIESTA GETS RESPITE FROM RAIN

PORTLAND, June 10.—(AP)—A beautiful young queen, Dorothy III, removed the city of Portland from the map today and substituted the far-famed, mythical kingdom of Rosaria.

Her loyal subjects plunged into four days of pageantry following her coronation at colorful ceremonies in Multnomah civic stadium last night.

Spatterings of rain all through the afternoon held off while thousands of citizens and visitors braved low temperatures to witness the crowning.

The tournament of roses band from Pasadena serenaded the city and the Victor McLaglen motor cycle corps from Hollywood thrilled the throngs with throbbing motors and daring riding. A company of 16 riders from the Portland hunt club escorted the queen.

The rose show opens today. The traditional floral parade comes Friday morning with the Merry-kana on Saturday.

Visitors at the festival will get a look at the Timberline lodge on Mount Hood Sunday when the new government-owned hostelry is opened.

The $500,000 structure is built of native wood and stone with interior carvings depicting the pioneer scene of the Oregon country.

A summer ski tournament will be held in connection with the Rose festival.

Police have fingerprinted 3,185 New-Arkansas City school children. The fingerprinting, sponsored by the Parent-Teachers' association, gives a positive identification record on every student in the school system.
