POET'S CORNER

THE PASSING OF A SYLVAN MONARCH By T. R. B. Bleak it rises from the greenery. From surrounding sylvan splendor, Stark it stands, contrasting grimly in majestic, greenest luster, Rot dully bark, gnarled, melancholy.

Patriarch of long past forest, Stripped of pomp and towering might; That defied all raging tempests, Or exulted bathed in sunlight, Monarch of that life long post.

Conquered not by wind nor weather, Lowered not by blight nor man, Overcome and stripped by neither, Vanquished only by the van Of time, the final conqueror.

Barren now and but a memory Of its pomp that once held sway, Destitute and solitary, Razed, and yet in shrilly gray, Dignified, though shrouded dreary.
