GANGSTERS SLAY TWO IN LOS ANGELES

graphically described how a small sedan without license plates swept up in front of the drab barroom out of the deep early morning fog.

"I saw three men get out," she told police, "while a fourth remained at the wheel. Two of the men walked toward the door. One of them stopped at the entrance. The other walked into the place. Both men had automatic guns in each hand."

"The man at the door waved guns at us—told us to keep quiet. The fourth man walked directly over to Bruneman's table and started shooting."

Three shots followed, and Greuzard, topped to the sidewalk in front of the place as the automobile roared away.

Capt. Bert Wallis of the police immediately sent out a call to have picked up three men whom he declined to identify. He also summoned a number of men he called "gambling big shots" for questioning.

Kidnap Case Recalled

Captain Wallis' immediate investigation was based on the supposition Bruneman was the victim of a private war among gambling interests.

The smiling operator broke into the headlines years ago when he was tried for alleged participation in the $50,000 ransom kidnaping of E. L. (Zeke) Carraw, race track handicapper, in 1930.

Carraw, his wife and Japanese chauffeur were abducted by the Sheldon gang, several of which were convicted.

Bruneman was finally acquitted in 1925 at a second trial when the court held he acted merely as a go-between, selected by Carraw himself, to cash the ransom check.

Killers Not Recognized

Ordered held as a material witness, Miss Ingram told police questioners at the emergency hospital that she did not recognize Bruneman's slayers.

She said their friendship began when she nursed him back to health after the Redondo beach ambush, had continued and they spent yesterday together.
