

Have Transient Peddlers and Out-of-Town Stores Contributed to Your Happiness?

Oft' times the things closest to us are not recognized. Instead, as long as we have them, they are taken and accepted as a matter of course. Yet, when once deprived of these public conveniences and improvements, you are forcibly and much to your regret reminded as to how really important and necessary they were to your happiness and contentment. Such conditions exist in smaller towns throughout the nation—towns, which once were small thriving cities but through their own shortsightedness slowly but surely decayed to a point where the markets for the farmers' produce were gone . . . the scholastic standard of the public school was not accepted in the higher seats of learning . . . All this calamity and trouble simply because through the lack of loyalty and cooperation on the part of the tradespeople and the business element, money that should by all rights have stayed at home, a per cent of which would have contributed to the maintenance and upkeep of the public functions that had disappeared so to speak, "in thin air" as transient peddlers and out-of-town stores drained the community of its resources.
