PARIS.—Blouses are in the limelight. The fall styles, featured in midseason collections, included a number of tailleurs with some brand new notions in this category. This is indeed the time to start haunting the blouse departments.

Begin, of course, by looking for a blouse that will transform last spring's navy or black or gray suit. Pick something that looks not at all like the blouses you wore with the suit last season. For example, you might consider at least one blouse in a shade that matches exactly the color of the suit. Nothing could be smarter, or look newer, than a black satin blouse with a black suit, a navy one with a dark blue, or gray with a suit of the same color.

The newest blouses are more akin to dress tops than to ordinary blouses. They either tuck in the skirt or else belong to the tunic variety, fitting smoothly over the hips. Sleeves are either short or long, (there are some women who do not look their best in long sleeves) and necklines continue to be worn high, although with a great deal more softness.

The "bloused" blouse, I. e., pouched all around the waistline, which Piguet launched in the spring, promises to continue its vogue well on into the coming season. These are particularly becoming to slim hipless figures.

Lace Encrustations
Very dressy blouses usually combine chiffon and fine chantilly or satin. The style is much more intricate, with the lace encrustations forming Louis XV bows or other motifs. Doves, and loops by the way, are coming in with the fall season. Margy Rouff trims the neckband of a slim black silk crepe tulle blouse with two large and wide loops of black satin ribbon knotted on one side, while Mainbocher finishes a bright royal blue satin blouse with an amusing little corolla collar, in front only, and wide twin loops which almost cover the bosom. This blouse is worn with a slim skirt and a full-length coat in black ribbed wool, the satin collar and loops being worn over the coat. A distinctly unusual idea.

Many of the more formal blouses offer the added advantage of doing double duty in the guise of informal dinner dresses, with the addition of a simple but well-cut skirt in satin or crepe or, later on in the season, in velvet. This skirt can be of the same color as the blouse or in black.

Lame chiffon, which is ultra thin and supple, makes a stunning evening blouse or, rather, an informal evening dress, when combined with a slender black silk jersey skirt. Bruyere showed one in her mid-season collection which was most attractive. The blouse in dull gold lame was very full, with a deep rounded yoke worked in the finest sunray plinkets. The fullness "bloused" all around the waistline and the long full and pouched sleeves were caught in at the wrist. This idea could be expressed most attractively. The blouse in silver and blue lame blouse combined with a midnight blue satin skirt, or in a number of other combinations, preserving the idea of lame for the blouse, however, which always lends a "party" look to things.

An effective and clear-cut paisley print is shown in this cleverly worked Lelong blouse. The color scheme is green and navy on white. It's worn with a navy suit and navy felt hat.
