WILD BISON STILL FOUND IN CANADA

By "DING" DARLING

Our buffalo, the American bison, is forever gone in its old abundance. The thundering herds of millions, sweeping from the Canadian prairies to the Gulf of Mexico and back in their search for fat grazing lands, could not now be tolerated in a country of railroads, towns, fences and farms.

There are many men now living who can recall the last of the vast herds. Bison vanished east of the Mississippi about 1900, but the last wild specimen was killed in the west less than 50 years ago. Sixty years ago, at Kearney, Nebraska, there was a factory for canning buffalo tongues. Buffalo robes were the standard equipment for every one who owned a horse and buggy. Bales of raw buffalo hides sold at 4 cents a pound.

Prey of Man and Wolf

From the buffalo, the Indians got food, clothing and shelter, the hides being used in making tepees. Hunted with arrows and lances, the enormous herds were never seriously affected before the coming of the white man. Great lobo olves followed the buffalo as they moved up and down the country, and destroyed the weak and old.

The white man made short work of this great natural endowment. As soon as a slight profit was discovered in the mass slaughter, the leather markets of the world were glutted with the cheap hides from the American bison and every farmer who wanted one could afford a buffalo overcoat.

There was little enough sport in buffalo hunting, and at times the plains were strewn with the rotting carcasses of splendid animals, killed for their hides alone.

Now Protected

The American Bison Society has made a close study of the history of the buffalo. It is estimated that in 1870, the surviving herds numbered about 14,000,000. The last census of bison, in 1929, gave 3,355 animals at large in the United States—living within the protection of national parks and U. S. Biological Survey Refuges. It is estimated there are 14,989 in Canada.

It is not generally known that bison in its wild state never did become entirely extinct. There re-
