POET'S CORNER

BY AN AFRICAN CAMPEIRE

By Alben Harness
Out of an arid waste remote and wide,
Which stretches far away on every side,
In an oasis, where light spheres fan
A green and gorgeous cloud of tall palm-trees,
Beside his tent behind the heavy gate,
Or his lion-proof stockade, a lonely man
Sits in the evening twilight, dim and late,
And listens to the rhythmic melodies
Of bells on camels in a caravan
And sees that caravan with humming
Along the summit of a mountain high,
A long black train against the crimson sky.

When no longer in his bearing swell
The halcyon intimation
Of the tuncful and concordant bells,
From its realm of fear and trepidation
Comes a soundless voice, yet loud or far
Than boom of cannon in a battle-zone,
And to his mental faculties it tells
That in Europe once great nations
Very soon shall start the greatest war
That all history has ever known.

The long night ends; the darkness is withdrawn,
And the radiant and glad, sweet dawn,
Making glimmered eastern heavens bright
With shining hairs of red and purple light,
Gives to his heart the buoyancy and joy
He knew along the Umpqua when a boy
At his mountain home in Oregon.

Extending through the desert, mile on mile,
A mirage, fairer than the scenic Nile,
Out in the golden sunlight meets his view,
False as that mirage seems to him the thought
The vast wasteland to his mind had brought.
And to himself he murmurs, with a smile,
"What that confounded voice let out, last night,
'Don't start in so awful soon to fight
A great big war, I don't believe is true.'"
