Danzig, Corridor City, May be Curtain Raiser for Next European War

By NEA Service

Danzig today is literally "in the middle." Should the long-feared European war break out with a clash over the possession of this ancient city, it would probably find itself immediately the point of convergence of military planes from the European countries involved. Over such a focal point, vast air conflicts could begin almost immediately.

Danzig is only 175 miles, less than an hour's bombing time, from Warsaw, the Polish capital, and only 250 miles, perhaps an hour and 15 minutes from Berlin. And both Poland and Germany have great air fields much closer to Danzig than these distances. In fact, it seems likely that either country could place Danzig beneath a shower of bombs in less than a half hour.

From Moscow, Paris and London it is roughly 800 miles to Danzig, which means that in less than four hours bombers from the great air forces of those countries could be over Danzig, and the time and distance to Rome is scarcely greater.

Wobbly Danzig

Assuming that Danzig became the spark in the European arsenal, a brief but sharp physical struggle for possession of the city which is today nominally neither Polish nor German, but a Free City, might be the first "curtain raiser" to the European tragedy. But its "in-the-middle" position suggests that a very few days after the first bomb fell there might be no more Danzig.

The present wobbly status of Danzig as a Free City is just one more of the Versailles solutions of pressing European problems which is being questioned today.

The problem was simple, Poland was being created, without an outlet to the sea assured to its commerce. The only practicable one was the Vistula river with its ancient port of Danzig at its mouth.

So, said the peace-makers, why not place Danzig back in the position it held for 300 years, from 1157 to 1793, as an independent city? A League of Nations commissioner could be installed to see that Poland got its uninterrupted right of a sea outlet, and yet that local self-government of the Danzigers, then nearly all Germans, was kept intact.

It sounded good. But the Danzigers never forgot that since 1793, at the second partition of Poland, Danzig had been German.

The gradual intrusion of Poles, especially in high positions, customs posts, mercantile jobs, and the like, was resented. And Germany never forgave the splitting off of East Prussia by the neutral "corridor" ending in Danzig at the sea.

"Return to Reich" Now the pressure is rising.

There seems little doubt that most Danzigers would prefer to "return to the German homeland."

But could Poland see that happen by violence and without guarantee of a certain sea outlet, without the possibility of loss of their own independence? It would seem a perfect place for peaceful adjustment of perfectly valid claims by both sides.

But the mood of Europe just now is not one in which the sensible weighing of just claims is likely to have much of a show, and the League of Nations, which was intended to have the balance of power in the conflicting claims at Danzig, is no longer in a position to exercise it.

One of the traditional meeting places, and clashing points between Teuton and Slav in Europe, may thus become a meeting place of the air fleets of Europe as well, distressingly "in the middle" today as it has been for centuries.
