PRaises OREGON'S 1ST WHITE WOMEN

UNIVERSITY OF OREGON, Eugene, July 12.—The first six white women to cross the Rockies into Oregon did much toward making the northwest the "cradle of American western civilization."

Dr. Clifford Merrill Drury, biographer and historian, told University of Oregon summer session students in an address recently.

In 1938 these women joined together to form the first women's club west of the divide, the Columbia Maternal association, which was "devoted to the founding of Christian homes in the west."

In the hope that they might train their children and husbands "in the way that they should go," said Dr. Drury, who has unearthed much new material in his research for biographies of Marcus Whitman and Henry Spaulding.

The first white women in Oregon were the wives of these two famed pioneers, who with their coming in 1826 laid not only the ground-work for Christianity in the northwest, but helped cast the die for progressive communities of which they dreamed but were never to see.

"The work that has been done thus far in investigating the lives of these lesser-known pioneers has hardly begun. We are still too young a people, perhaps, but realization of the import of their problems will come in time," the speaker declared.

He urged conservation of the old letters and relics that the northwest has to offer, and pointed to their study as a possible solution to more fully understanding the future.

SILVERTON, July 12.—(AP)—"Looking for somebody?" asked 80-year-old B. Ryan, wood cutter, as he met a party headed by Chief of Police Omar Halverson last night in the timber.

Informed the party was looking for him, Ryan snorted: "Can't a man stay out over night without people getting excited about it?" he explained he had remained at his camp to save himself a trip to town.
