FLIER SAVES SELF, AIDE IN 'PANCAKE'

BAKER, Aug. 30.—(AP)—An ability to set a plane down in a tiny clearing probably saved the lives of Art Walters, veteran Baker pilot, and his helper, Verris Shively, forest service man, this morning as the motor of the plane Walters was flying failed as he was distributing food and supplies to forest fire fighters in the Imnaha region.

The area in which the plane was pancaked is practically inaccessible and had the men been half a mile from the spot their deaths would have been almost certain because of the mountainous condition of the area.

According to a telephone message from Walters to the forest service headquarters here, the men had dropped three packages of supplies near the fire camp, only a quarter of a mile away, and were jockeying into position to toss over the next supply roll, when the motor gave a few sputters and failed completely.

Walters said he had the clearing spotted already in case of emergency and when that occurred he headed for it. With a dead stick in his hands he still managed to get into the cleared spot although he said he overshot it a trifle. He could not stop the plane and it bounced into Cliff creek, struck against a log in the creek and was almost completely demolished. The men climbed out of the ship without a sign of injury.
