Blackouts or No, Women of Paris Still Dress Charming for Evening

An original touch of embroidery outlining pockets and neckline, done in colored cabochon and pendant beads mixed with gold are sufficient to convey the new semi-formal touch to this Rosevienne dress of black silk crepe. The skirt is sunray pleated in contrast with the bodice and the sleeves are youthful.

BUT SIMPLICITY STILL GUIDES THE DESIGNERS

By ROSETTE HARGROVE (NEA Service Staff Correspondent)

PARIS—So far as Frenchwomen are concerned, it's patriotic to dress for the evening whenever the occasion demands it.

At the outbreak of war, it was a natural instinct to put away all party clothes, but now the men are coming home on leave, it is up to the women to look their most charming to make them forget the war.

Fashions always reflect the "climate" of the moment and the recent creations shown by the Parisian designers for "dressing up" occasions are full of interest, yet at the same time practical and simple. On the other hand, they are styles which will appeal to women the world over.

FORMAL DECOLLETAGE IS NOT WORN

Paris suggests two alternatives—the formal street-length dress or the full-length dinner gown. The formal decollete evening dress has naturally disappeared from the Parisienne's wardrobe.

The long dinner or theater dress usually has long sleeves and a high neckline, but sleeves "pushed back" over the elbow are as smart. So far as line is concerned, both long and short skirts preserve the slim hipline and the nipped-in waist effect, but nearly all show varying degrees of fullness.

Hedices are either easy-fitting or skin-tight (Alix) often fastening center front and many show subtle draperies usually massed over the bosom. Necklines are neither exaggerated high nor low, the newest line stopping at the base of the throat, either rounded or squared.

Application motifs—these most intricately worked and providing the best delicate workmanship—have been revived with much success. These are usually carried out on net or chiffon bases for greater contrast. Deep sheer yokes continuing into sleeves, and often forming almost the entire back, will offer a transparent contrast of setting the opaqueness of the remainder of the dress.
