Every state, county and city official or board that handles public money should publish at regular intervals an accounting of it showing where and how each dollar is spent. This is a fundamental principle of democratic government.

SCARCELY a single voice dissonant as the United States launches into a vast military preparedness program.

The bitter lessons driven home each week, each day, each hour in Europe are being learned at last.

The United States has not sought this. For 20 years we have not built a battleship. We disbanded our great world war army, and kept a standing army smaller than Switzerland's. But the rest of the world was unwilling to follow suit. We are in the world, and we must play the world's game.

We must rearm. That means a reduction in our standards of living. It will touch every man, woman and child in the country. To fail to recognize this truth and face it squarely is to weaken the armament effort itself.

How did Germany succeed in building its uncanonically effective military machine? By sacrifice. By guns instead of butter. By putting half of everything the German people produced into the building of the machine, and making them live on the rest and like it.

Because the United States is richer, that is, has more productive facilities, it ought not to be necessary for us to go that far. But the principle is the same—it is all a matter of degree.

Production and productive facilities must be greatly increased. The wage-hour act, the Walsh-Healy act, and many measures taken to increase the standard of living of workers are already being attacked by army officers. France and England had to jettison the short work week as soon as they got into war, and Australia is having conflicts over these factors.

Profit-limits will immediately come to the fore. It is all right to ask an auto plant to re-tool to build airplane engines. How much of the expense and trouble should be paid for in cash, and how much charged up to patriotism? Certainly the arms program must not be made a profiteers' holiday. Yet restrictions making losses possible may tend to hold up the increased production needed. Among these problems of labor and industry the government must steer carefully.

And taxes. Does anyone think that these billions can be poured out after the billions spent fighting depression without making higher taxes inevitable? Defense must be paid for, and the most paying ought to be done by those who have the most to defend. But every man, woman and child must pay in one way or another.

To say these things, to look squarely into the teeth of the course into which events have forced us, is the best way to navigate that course effectively.

FINAL note, about noon Wednesday: Mussolini still hasn't gone in.

So, you see, there is still doubt in informed quarters as to the outcome of the great battle that is expected to decide the war.

OUT OUR WAY

Cooking School Plans Complete

Plans are practically completed for the News-Review three-day free cooking school which starts Tuesday under the personal direction of Miss Barbara Miller, noted home economist.

Miss Miller's "Happy Kitchen" program promises to be one of the most interesting and colorful events of its kind ever staged here. There will be points of interest for every housewife—from the young bride to the experienced cook.

This well-known economist has advised the News-Review that she will welcome questions from her audience, so make a list of all your little kitchen worries and let Miss Miller straighten them out for you.

The lectures will be conducted in a most informal manner, and Miss Miller says she likes to feel as though the women in the audience had "just dropped in" of an afternoon, rather than attending a lecture.

There will be many different dishes prepared on each of the three afternoons—selected step-by-step, simply and successfully. Remember the hours, 2 to 4 o'clock at the armory. The school will be conducted Wednesday and again on Friday following the Memorial day holiday, at the same hour. The program will be different each day, Miss Miller states.

Before she realized she might be involving herself, she stepped into the limousine. But when she saw Carla exchange a look with her chauffeur, Mary felt she had been hasty about accepting the invitation.

Carla chatted amiably. "I know all about you from Vincent. What a miracle it was that you're alive after that terrible disaster!"

The car drew up to a side entrance in Mayfair. The chauffeur helped them out. The house was far more luxurious than Mary had expected.

"We'll go upstairs to the drawing room," Carla directed. With a smile she turned to the chauffeur. "Will you bring us tea?" To Mary again she explained, "During wartime, I've had to cut down my staff. Felix is my man of all work."

Upstairs a fire was blazing in the richly ornamented fireplace. "You wanted to talk about Vincent?" Mary asked when they were seated.

"Yes," Carla answered. "I feel he's in very grave danger." "Danger? How? From what?" Mary was alarmed.

Carla smiled pityingly. "Vincent is a very indifferent young man," she replied. "For both your sakes, I believe it would be better if you did not testify when the Moravia investigation is reopened."

"But I must," Mary spoke with spirit. "I almost lost my life and if I can help in any way to prevent other lives being lost I'm going to do all I can."

A silver tray laden with a handsome tea service was brought in. Felix had changed his white-clothed jacket to a starched, white coat.

Mary saw him look at Carla searchingly. Almost imperceptibly he nodded his head. Then "There's a call for you on the wire."

"Will you excuse me?" Carla asked Mary. "Felix will pour your tea."

Mary sat before the crackling fire sipping her tea. Her hands shook and the cup slipped, spilling tea on the rug. A fresh feeling of alarm had flooded her with Carla's warning of Vincent's danger. Carla Marchetta had always been able to fill her with a sense of foreboding.

But despite all this she found herself relaxing. Drowsiness began to steal over her, a strange numbing drowsiness. She tried to fight it off. She wanted to stand up. But she could not rise from her chair.

Hours must have passed. It was dark. Mary woke from a heavy, dreamless sleep. Where YESTERDAY: Even when she agrees to Vincent's plea that they start over again, forgetting the Moravia and the weeks that followed, Mary knows something is lacking. Gilbert comes home unexpectedly, is delighted to find Mary's beauty restored. Mary tells him she intends marrying Vincent and Gilbert agrees. As he leaves Mary knows she loves Gilbert, not Vincent.

CHAPTER XXI
Mary knew in that instant that she was in love with Gilbert Lenox—madly, poignantly in love with him.

In the same instant she knew she loved Gilbert Lenox, Mary Carroll realized her first loyalty was to Vincent Gregg.

They had been engaged and she'd promised to marry him when she was free. Gilbert had a brilliant career ahead of him and Vincent had nothing but her. Vincent needed her.

The newspaper she had brought home lay tossed aside on the table. Its importance forgotten in the overwhelming surprise of Gilbert's return. Now in the sudden loneliness of the room after Gilbert's departure, Mary momentarily awaited Vincent's arrival. She must talk to him about this turn of events which would make her a witness in the reopening of the Moravia investigation.

When he didn't appear for their usual tea, she decided to stroll towards Trafalgar Square to meet him.

In the streets, the ever-present testimony of war defense could not be overlooked. You had to watch lest you fall into dugout or stumble against a sandbag while, high in the air, a floating platform of alter testified the vigilance of the royal air force.

Mary had gone but a few squares when a chauffeur-driven car drew up beside her.

"Mrs. Lenox, I'd like to speak to you," a voice called from the car's tannoy.

Mary looked up, startled. She was face to face with Carla Marchetta. But there was nothing disturbing about Carla. Her smile, instead, was disarming.

"You must forgive me," Carla went on, "for this informal way of speaking to you. I was, in fact, on my way to your address when I recognized you."

"But what do you want?" Mary asked.

"I want to talk to you about something that concerns all of us. Won't you come with me to my home for tea?"

Mary hesitated. Fear of Carla held her back, but the magnetism of the woman drew her on. After all, she was a friend of Vincent's. Why should Mary be afraid?

Before she realized she might be involving herself, she stepped into the limousine. But when she saw Carla exchange a look with her chauffeur, Mary felt she had been hasty about accepting the invitation.

Carla chatted amiably. "I know all about you from Vincent. What a miracle it was that you're alive after that terrible disaster!"

But despite all this she found herself relaxing. Drowsiness began to steal over her, a strange numbing drowsiness. She tried to fight it off. She wanted to stand up. But she could not rise from her chair.

Hours must have passed. It was dark. Mary woke from a heavy, dreamless sleep. Where was she? She had no way to guess.

With the sharpening of senses that danger brings, Mary strained her ears. What she heard was so shocking, so unbelievable, she was fully awake at once! Carla's voice, high pitched and commanding. Felix's lower tones. Something about a ship. Mary held her breath.

She must get away on the instant.

Outside her room were sounds of hurried packing, the flurry of footsteps back and forth.

She heard a man's voice: "What are we going to do with the girl?" "We'll take her with us," Carla Marchetta spoke sharply.

"To Bristol? To Von Blum's? You're crazy. Von Blum's not asking us for weekend party."

"Lock her in then. She's got enough opiate in her to keep her unconscious for another 12 hours. We'll be safe by then."

"How about Vincent?" "Vincent can take care of himself. Did you send that message?" "Certainly. Static on the time signal."

Mary heard a key turn in her door. There was the sound of departing footsteps on the stairs and in the hallway below. An outside door closed. Then all was silent.

Despite her reeling head and weakness, she managed a few faltering steps. What she had heard was so unmistakable that she knew at last Carla Marchetta's role in the spy ring posting the enemy on British maritime orders.

Mary was trapped in the room, locked and barred. She went to a window. The deserted street was far below. Even if she could scream no one would hear her. Then she had an intuitive flash. She groped for the light switch. The blackout might save her.

Joe Walton Wins

Oratory Contest

Joe Walton, of Deer Creek

grange, Josephine county, was announced today as the winner of the regional highway safety oratorical contest, held Thursday, under grange sponsorship at the Evergreen grange hall.

Contestants from four counties participated in the regional meeting, each having won contests in the respective counties.

Lane county was represented by Robert Cox of Four Oaks grange. Coos county was represented by Jeanette Escott of Sumner grange, and Douglas county was represented by Cecil Pierce of Melrose grange.

Walton, the Josephine county contestant, by virtue of winning the regional contest, will go to the state competition to be held in connection with the Oregon State Grange convention at Salem, June 10 to 14.

Mrs. Paula Anderson of Kellogg, lecturer of Douglas county Pomona grange, presided over the contest.

The competition is sponsored by the Oregon State Grange and the subordinate units in the interest of promoting highway safety.
