

French Tactics In Battle Explained

By DEWITT MacKENZIE
The allied forces withstood the initial German onslaught yesterday well, and French military leaders said the situation this morning was "fairly good."

The nazis renewed their assault with great fury at dawn today and their version of the position is that they have broken the French line at several points.

However, this battle which likely will decide the outcome of the war, hasn't proceeded far enough for us to draw sweeping conclusions.

The French plan appears to have performed his good deed of the day with splendid morale yesterday, and the carrying of Allied Generalissimo Weygand was in evidence in the sturdiness of his line of defense at the outset.

Beyond that we cannot go at this moment, for we know that Weygand will have performed wonders if he is able to hold that line anywhere near its present position. In defense perhaps the greatest defensive action of history, he is trying to match superior military strength with skill and the spirit among his willing troops to do or die.

Tactics Explained
You will have note that the patches speak of the French line as being constructed "in depth." What that means is this:
The term "line" is rather a misnomer, since it gives the impression of infantry drawn up shoulder to shoulder. Actually the Weygand "line" may be several miles deep in places.
That is, instead of having a solid line, big and little strategic points along the whole front are defended as best suits the situation, and there may be very considerable spaces between these defensive positions which have no troops in them at all, but are dominated by machine-gun nests and other methods.

In many a battle a single machine-gun nest containing perhaps two or three men, has been able because of its dominating position to control several hundred yards of "front."

The French report that the German loss in tanks which form one of the greatest menaces to the allies, has been very heavy because of the operation of "in depth" line. The tanks have merely moved out of the way and let these steel monsters run through after which the line has again been closed. The tanks thus cut off have been blasted to pieces by the famous French 75s, which are fired at point-blank range.
