Every state, county and city official or board that handles public money should publish at regular intervals an accounting of it, showing where and how each dollar is spent. This is a fundamental principle of democratic government.

Eight Years Successful

THIS week marks the eighth anniversary of the establishment of the CCC camps. The idea of these camps came upon the national scene along with numerous other new deal measures—many of which were either failures or thrown out by the courts as unconstitutional.

The CCC plan not only was quickly accepted generally as being good, but it has been kept intact very much in its original form. From the very outset the CCC has been a constructive force in more ways than one. It has built health, it has built character and a respect for discipline in the enrollees—who, in turn, have built countless thousands of useful and valuable improvements.

Space does not permit a complete list here of the construction projects completed by CCC boys during the eight years. Suffice to say that the miles of road constructed run into the many thousands. As one of what might be called minor items, the boys have built some 40,000 miles of fence!

Buildings of all kinds, including dwellings, shelters, barns, etc., have been completed numbering into the thousands. Bridges, culverts, camps, furniture—so many different things that enumeration of them is nigh impossible, have come from the CCC plan work.

In other words, during the period of time when the term "boondoggling" was invented and fully earned by other federal undertakings, the CCC has gone forward with a constructive and successful program.

Unlisted Defense Cost

WE like to think that thus far the United States is building its defenses without extra costs in blood. And yet—

The National Safety council, in listing the second worst February in history in regard to traffic toll, believes that at least half of the increase is due to defense activities. In the first place, there are in general more vehicles on the road, and more miles are being driven. Then the roads are also carrying hundreds of military vehicles that were not there before. Counties which have new defense industries almost uniformly show great increases in traffic accidents.

A certain amount of this is probably unavoidable. But now is the time to make every effort to cut these losses to a minimum. Hours lost to the defense drive in a hospital bed are just as completely lost as those lost on a picket line.

There is a national defense that goes on quietly year in and year out without fuss and feathers or fanfare that is the defense of our national forests against the fire enemy. Summer weather and fire danger are not far away now. Our national forest defense will be on the alert but the cooperation of the public is essential.

Remember the banquet Tuesday evening. Reservations may be made either at the Hotel Umpqua or chamber of commerce office.

smashed by the British.

THE third yarn (in some ways the most plausible) has it that Hitler ordered the Italian fleet into action in order to compel the British to concentrate their naval strength in the eastern Mediterranean, thus leaving the western part free enough to enable him to slip across re-enforcements for the Italians in western Libya.

This seems to have happened. At least the Germans have sufficient forces in Africa (estimated at about 20,000 men) to have compelled the British, weakened by shipment of troops to Greece, to abandon Bengasi.

AS an independent force, Italy seems to be out of the war.

American correspondents who have returned from Rome (and are therefore free of censorship) assert that Italy has been so thoroughly taken possession of by Germany that any idea of revolution against the axis and going over to Britain is out of the question.

According to these correspondents, Italy is now just another conquered German province.

THESE surmises, it should be kept in mind, are not to be accepted as facts. The real story of what is happening around the Mediterranean is guarded so closely by efficient censorship that no authentic news of it can possibly be obtained.

But AS SURMISES they are at least interesting, because they hint strongly that all is not going as smoothly for Hitler as he would like.

Instead of moving victoriously into the Balkans on his own initiative and taking what he wanted there, it is beginning to look as if he has been DRAWN IN there, step by step, always against his will, moving each time he moves because he HAS TO and not because he wants to.

REMEMBER, please, that this also is pure guesswork. But by the process of putting two and two together to make four it looks plausible.

If there is any truth to these guesses, it means that Hitler is beginning to lose the offensive.

The South Umpqua camp is the only company in the state for Oregon men. All Oregon enrollees are sent to this camp, which now has men from Multnomah, Lane, Douglas, Coos, Josephine, Jackson and Klamath counties. The camp was constructed and occupied in the summer of 1935.

During the six years the camp has been occupied the chief work projects have been the reconstruction of the Tiller-South Umpqua road, completion of a section of the Red Butte truck trail and Callahan truck trail; construction and landscaping of the Tiller ranger station and construction of several dwellings and lookout towers. In addition the men of the camp have done much work at Diamond lake, have made thousands of rustic signs for the forest service and many pieces of equipment. FIND THE SOLUTION

CHAPTER XI

ALL the way down the hill to Elm Street, April remembered the last sight of Kent's face.

He had gone white and following her to the gate, had reached out as imploring hand. "Then I'm to blame if you never sing again. I thought you understood I loved your voice, Ann, that I wanted you to sing for your people, your friends and me. You even said you'd forgotten the stupid quarrel."

The walk was slippery. April crunched the hailstones under her heel. "Please, Kent," she had said, "I don't want to talk about it."

When she hurtled the car away from his door, she found the storm-washed air like a cold draught in her feverish brain. Yes, that had been her downfall, going into Kent's house. He was suspicious already, hurt, bewildered, and there was nothing she could do.

Then something struck her. What was it Kent had said in those last words? "I thought you understood I loved your voice, Ann, that I wanted you to sing for your people, your friends and me."

Her mind seized a second thought. When she had talked to Ann on long distance last night, Ann had said, "As a matter of fact, if Kent only knew it, he was the one who spurred me on to take this New York venture."

So that was it! Kent hadn't wanted Ann to have a career. He'd opposed the idea of her going on her own to New York. So they had quarreled and in the end, Ann had started off in hurt defiance.

OCTAVIA was waiting for April, as usual. "Been pacing here," she dramatized, "not knowing what sort of wreck or trouble you was in."

"Well, it wasn't a wreck."

"The Lawd be praised. You's safe. And a bad storm it is, Miss April. Your father done send word he and your mother won't be back for another day. Snowed in, ah reckons."

And April had been counting on Mother and Dad. "Oh," she said.

Nip wagged back to the kitchen, barking for food and drink. "Jes' soon's Ah gives this hound something to quiet his bark down, you can tell me about this here outing," Octavia said.

"There isn't much to tell."

Octavia, sure that April was sound in neck and limb, was breathing easier. "From the looks of you," she said, "seems like you wasn't 'xactly cut out to be a Campfire Girl."

"Or a Girl Scout either," April snapped as she started for her room upstairs.

A hot bath, a hair-brush, a bottle of cologne drenched over her aching forehead and then the comfort of her white terry robe. That's what she needed, and sleep, plenty of it when she wouldn't have to think about today or tomorrow or any days to come.

An hour afterwards, April was sitting before her mirror. The yellow curls were brushed upward in her own way, the white robe, tight bodiced, swept out in a full skirt that was like a fan framing her figure.

Octavia moved in her mountainous fashion to the doorway. "Ah clean forgets to tell you that Mister Hal Parks' been a 'phoning all day."

"Hal Parks?" For a minute, April's eyes, horizon blue now like the hills she and Kent had seen today, flickered with interest. Then the flicker faded. "If he calls again," she said, "ask him if he will please excuse me tonight."

Any other time, she would have welcomed seeing Hal. Tonight, the memory of Kent, their day, the fatal anti-climax, was too fresh in her mind.

"He's a handsom' gentleman," Octavia was saying. "Seems like Ah finds him most in my favor of the gentlemen courtin' you, Miss April."

"Yes," said April, "yes, indeed." Then she spun around. "Ever hear of a Glitterbug, Octavia?"

Octavia shook her head. "Can't say that I did, Miss April."

"Well, you will," April predicted, "and plenty."

When Octavia had gone, April still sat at the looking glass, where words like demons began to prance in front of her. "The trouble with April is that she never looks beyond her mirror." "Everyone raves at how beautiful she is. Personally, I could never see it."

More words. "The Glitterbug figures she's the belle of the town and everyone owes her homage."

The powder puff which April held automatically in her hand as she leaned forward to dust her small, pert and perfect nose, went flying. She tore off the white robe and snapped out the light. Then with her face buried deep in the pillows, she began to cry, softly at first and then with sobs that shook her bed.

IT was almost noon when she awoke. Outside the storm which had started off with a spitfire of hailstones yesterday, had calmed to a steady snow. Trees were white; house tops coated in the same fine-powdered silver.

April stared and then away. Perhaps Kent had called while she was asleep. Maybe Octavia had answered the telephone and blundered out the whole secret. Kent! The picture of him in his dark glasses, the way he smiled, came before her. He'd had a three-day leave against the darkness. Suddenly, she wanted to hold him in her arms, comfort him, laugh away the stinging, unkind tirade he had launched against her. There was that picture, and then, on the bureau was the picture of Ann, her sister. It seemed as if Ann were looking at her with a wistful reproach.

Octavia brought orange juice, coffee and toast, quite a concession on her part but which she explained by saying she'd had to postpone the family wash on account of the storm.

"What sort of plans you got for the day, Miss April?"

"This is my day to sit by the fire and knit."

"You sure talking strange talk, Miss April."

"It's the weather, it's got me down. By the way, any cables, radiograms, telegrams, money orders or telephone calls for me?"

She held her breath as Octavia answered. "No, ma'm, seems like we're kinda snowed in under."

Kent would be leaving on the 7 o'clock evening train. Well, let him leave. The young conscript would see that he got on the train and be his eyes for him on the trip back to the base hospital.

Nothing she could do at this eleventh hour would help.

It was near the dinner hour when a postman brought an air-mail, special delivery letter. April fastened her wavering eyes on it—saw that it was from her sister, Ann, in New York.
