would be from among the production men. Later, he said, 2,400 non-production men, not under the jurisdiction of the UAW-CIO, also would be laid off.

"Both the company and the union," Addes said, "agreed that the balance of the present working force can be used for the production quotas allowed by the office of production management through to end of November."

Addes defined probationary workers as men employed during the last six months who have no seniority rights established under the UAW-CIO contract with the Ford company.

Harry H. Bennett, Ford personnel director, who first announced the plan for laying off 20,000 workers, said that the government-ordered curtailment of passenger car output made it necessary to start lay-offs now.

He said also that slowdowns and wildcat strikes had sharply increased Ford production costs.

In Washington, office of production management officials said that OPM representatives would confer in Detroit this week with principal automobile firms confronted with the layoff of thousands of workers because of curtailment of automobile production.

The OPM representatives plan to provide the industry with additional defense work and shifting displaced workers into defense employment in the industry or elsewhere.
