Fashion Turns to Cotton as Silk and Wool Go to War

DESIGNERS POINT TO VELVETEEN AS EXAMPLE OF ITS VERSATILITY

Wearing this cotton velveteen, Dinah Shore, the singer, is dressed in a cotton creation that will see her throughout the entire day—and is quite fitting for cocktails and dining later. Beautifully tailored with a two-button closing, the jacket has a black frog trimming on the breast pocket. She carries a neat, modern handbag, together with gloves, in a matching American Beauty color.

The drastic new OPM conservation program, reducing by 50 or 60 per cent allocation of new wool to manufacturers of civilian clothing, plus the known shortage of silks, places fashion's spotlight on cotton fabrics, of which the supply is plentiful.

Designers have discovered that cotton fabrics have almost limitless possibilities for creative, colorful, all-purpose clothes—a bright note to fit in with the nation's war conservation program.

Cotton velveteen is listed by the designers as one of their out-

Presto chango! Miss Shore retains the chic jacket—but combines it with black, cotton velveteen slacks. Excellent for entertaining at home, or for a skiing week-end.

This gray, one-piece dress, has a fitted boucle bodice with a Byron collar and a wide cotton velveteen skirt. Dinah Shore calls it a perfect afternoon dress.

A lovely, flattering fabric, its pleasing versatility has won it a high place among the "round-the-clock" women's clothing materials.

In cotton velveteen you can be charmingly dressed for any occasion—from active sports in slacks to partying in a lovely evening gown.

This emerald cotton velveteen with flaring skirt is designed for waiting. Jeweled birds are designed in flight across the draped surplice bodice, and novel double shoulder straps, one set ending in a halter, make it a conversation piece. A perfect dress for gala winter evenings, says singer Dinah Shore, who proves the point by modeling it, above.
