Business Girls: File These "Working Wardrobe" Rules for Fall Reference

The business girl blouse, pictured at left, below, dresses up in a jiffy. Just insert jeweled cuff-links when you reverse the French cuffs. For efficiency, it has a convertible neck and a real shirt-tail. In black or any deep color, the crepe dress, right, flatters the business girl after hours, when she adds decorative clips, pins, bracelet or belt. It has two distinct assets for the office—good lines and quiet detail. Sixteen hundred girls in 48 states named the style points and price they wanted in a "perfect business suit"—and here's the suit, center. It's a dressmaker model of feminine cut. The long jacket has neat slot pockets. The stay-pleated skirt features a deep underlay of the wool fabric.

The business girl may have to put down somebody else's ideas from nine to five, but when it comes to the clothes she wears, it's her turn to dictate.

That seems to be the slogan of several outstanding houses nowadays. They are featuring dresses, suits and blouses designed especially for Uncle Sam's 7,000,000-odd working nieces. So shopping may be easier this fall for the girl who's doing her part for defense by stepping up efficiency in her own job.

You can begin being more efficient by getting better work out of your wardrobe.

Here's a very simple key to improving your wardrobe. Just look at it. Write down on paper what you need and what you have. Then go to your closet and see how many of last year's things are in good condition. Think over the whole thing, decide what to buy and when to buy it. You'll be surprised how much this helps in shopping, especially if you've been a haphazard shopper. For once you have your whole wardrobe clearly in mind, you'll automatically shop for things that go together—and you won't think frantically of your budget.

Every working wardrobe requires some basic garments, and those are much easier to choose now that versatile clothes are plentiful. You need at least a good-looking suit and blouse, another blouse or a sweater, a wool dress for work or any informal party, another frock that dresses "up" for a date or "down" for work, and a fur or fur-trimmed coat.

Flexibility and value are stressed in the new business-girl clothes. They were designed for the lass who knows the difference between a cheap skirt that will pull out at the seams the first time its wearer bends over quickly, and a lasting moderate priced blouse. One of this fall's washable blouses has a convertible neck, reversible French cuffs and a long shirt-tail.

Style Counts More Than Fashion

A dress that will meet two very different needs is offered in dark wine colors as well as in black. It's a new version of the basic dress, which looks right at any hour. Without accessories, this soft, fitted dress is simple enough to please the most conservative personnel manager—yet this same crepe frock can be intensely dramatic with evening jewels. It is just the thing for a girl who has a really striking belt, pin or clips.

The thoughtful shopper recognizes at a glance how much thought has gone into the design of a dress, and that truth carries weight in superior houses. One has just made a business-girl suit based on a contest conducted by a fashion magazine.

Sixteen hundred girls in 48 states wrote down their ideas of the "perfect suit," and its pleasant to report that they asked for one that costs more than $25—but with these specific points: good fabric, neat pockets, and a stay-pleated skirt with generous underlays.

Evidently the outstanding career girl knows that it's style more than fashion that counts with the boss.
