September Very Dry, Report Shows

Only twice in weather bureau history, dating back to 1878, has the month of September shown less rainfall than for the month just past, according to the monthly meteorological report compiled in charge of the local station of the U. S. weather bureau. Conforming to wartime restrictions, the report was released today, providing a lapse of one week from the last date included in the summary.

Rainfall for the month totalled only nine one-hundredths of an inch. Twice before the month of September, which has a normal rainfall of 1.27 inches, has been drier, only .03 of an inch having been recorded in September, 1929, and .06 of an inch in 1932.

Temperature showed a daily excess of 1.7 degrees above the normal average. The highest temperature recorded was 95 degrees on the 22nd and the lowest was 39 degrees on the 18th. The month was 1.18 inches deficient in rainfall, bringing the total deficiency since Jan. 1, 1942, to 5.79 inches. September 1 marked the beginning, for the purpose of the records, of the 1942-43 wet season, despite the fact that there was practically no rainfall to be reported.
