1943 Farm Labor Problems to be Studied Locally

A study of 1943 farm labor conditions and needs in every county in the state, to be accompanied by concrete plans for meeting the local situations, will be made in a series of county farm-labor program-planning meetings which started February 25 and continuing through March 16.

The meetings have been arranged jointly by the O. S. C. Extension service and United States employment service in cooperation with the state agricultural advisory committee and the Oregon USDA war board, says L. R. Brethaupt, extension project leader for farm labor.

Attending the meetings will be all members of the county farm labor subcommittees, as well as state representatives of the selective service, employment service, and the extension service and war board. Invitations have also been extended to all members of the state and county USDA war boards, selective service boards, state and local officials, and to the farmer subcommittees on crops and livestock in each county.

These county farm-labor subcommittees, formed last year, performed an important and valuable service in 1942 and aided the employment service in handling farm-labor problems much better in Oregon than occurred in many agricultural states. Even so, there is need for greater efforts this year, according to those in touch with the food production problems. It is hoped to review 1942 results, analyze the 1943 situation, and devise ways and means for meeting the coming year's problems as possible under the stress of war conditions. In the meantime, farmers who need help can make full use of the employment service by registering their needs early.
