dustrial Ruhr valley, is smacked by a force of RAF bombers that may have numbered as many as 600 or 700. Thirty-three were lost.

Wuppertal (not hitherto bombed) is a chemical and roller bearing factory center.

NOTE the every-other-night pace of last week's bombing—Sunday night, Tuesday night, Thursday night, Saturday night. Each time a different target, leaving the Germans to wonder where next.

Goering's boast that enemy bombs NEVER WOULD FAIL on German soil must be rather a ghastly joke by this time.

THIS writer, who isn't ferocious-minded, and gets little personal satisfaction out of the mauling of ANY KIND of human beings, can't escape the conviction that constant bombing of Germany is a good object lesson for Germans—who, since Napoleon, haven't seen their country invaded and so have come to think that the horrors of war are something that GERMANS inflict on OTHER PEOPLE.

GIRAUD and DeGaulle get together in Algiers and appoint a seven-man executive commission for the handling of French governmental affairs. Algiers, in effect, becomes the provisional capital of the France that remains as a spiritual rather than a practical entity.

Let's never forget that the France that fell in 1940 had been undermined and eaten out by the politicians. That's what happens when countries sink to the point where they are governed by self-seeking political demagogues instead of STATESMEN.

FOLLOWING the final burying of the hatchet by DeGaulle and Giraud, the units of the French fleet that have been interned at Alexandria come to our side. They include two battle-ships, two heavy cruisers, a light cruiser, three destroyers and a submarine.

That sounds like a lot of naval strength, but really isn't much. The ships, for the most part, are old and in the nearly three years they have been interned in Alexandria have fallen into neglect and disrepair and the morale of their crews has been destroyed.

THE Chinese, the dispatches tell us scantily, have hit back at the Japs advancing up the Yangtze toward Chingking, inflicting considerable losses on the invaders.

WE can't help admiring the heroic Chinese for the stamina they have displayed in their long years of war with the Japs, but we MUSTN'T let ourselves forget that it was political disintegration, long continued, that brought China to her position of near helplessness, her industry so UNDEVELOPED that when her hour of terrible trial came her still-tough people had little more than their bare hands to fight with.

NEW ADVERTISING MANAGER

EDITORIAL

By Charles V. Stanton

THE News-Review management is very pleased to announce the employment of Miss Clarethel Roselund to head the display advertising department. The News-Review has maintained a policy of employing Douglas county young people, insofar as possible, in all departments, believing that they are just as intelligent and just as capable, and maybe more so, as those who might be imported. Miss Roselund has proven this theory. She not only stood at the head of her class in the high school here, but at the University of Oregon school of journalism was one of the outstanding students of the 1943 class.

She takes the place made vacant by the resignation of M. O. (Tiny) Ream, to whom the News-Review owes a debt of gratitude for his continued and efficient service at much personal sacrifice. Mr. Ream, an experienced newspaper publisher, came to our aid in a time of need and has remained as head of the advertising department until his place could be filled, despite the fact that, because of the shortage of farm labor, he was forced to do a day's work on his farm after leaving the News-Review office in the evening. We greatly appreciate the postponement of his resignation until capable replacement could be secured.

Miss Roselund is well known by many of our advertising clients. As quickly as time permits, she will make herself acquainted with those who do not now know her. We are sure you will all like her as well as we do and that you will find she is able to give you the best of advice, assistance and service in connection with advertising problems.

An editorial writer for The Oregonian sees in the death-of-the-last-man stand of the Jap soldiers on Attu island a possibility the Japanese people have engaged in a war which will be ended only when the last Jap is killed. He holds there is evidence the win-or-die procedure has been extended wholesale, including men, women and children. "It is a terrible thought," he remarks, "that the Japanese leaders have fastened upon their people a theory of war—designed for their own victory—which will compel extinction of a whole people in defeat." Is it, he wants to know, "a prelude to the suicide of 80,000,000?"

It may be terrible, all right, but it looks like a darned good solution to maintaining future peace in the Pacific. It's going to take a lot of shooting to dispose of eighty million Japs, but if they have adopted that theory, then "Praise the Lord and pass the ammunition!"

The current war-caused commodity shortage has one good angle—not so much chewing gum is being parked under theater and restaurant seats.

Washington News From an Inside View

Argument, Sentiment, Comment

By HARRIS ELLSWORTH
 Congressman, Fourth Oregon District

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 29—The House Public Lands committee, of which I am a member, has been holding extensive hearings this week on a bill introduced by Representative Frank Barrett of Wyoming to abolish the Jackson Hole national monument, which was established by executive order March 15 this year. This might not seem important so far as Oregon and my district are concerned, but I will tell you in a moment why it is important to us. But first the Jackson Hole story.

From time to time for a period of 46 years the National Park service has been endeavoring to have 210,000 acres of land adjacent to the Grand Teton range and the Teton National park (which is only a few miles from Yellowstone) included in the national park. The matter has been before congress formally twice but did not receive favorable action. The subject has also been studied and reported upon unfavorably by congressional committees. The last such report was in 1938. So far as the people of Wyoming, including their governor, their two senators and their representatives in congress knew, the issue was a dead one when on March 15 the president, by executive order, created those identical acres into a national monument. This was done without any hearing and without notice of any kind to anyone directly concerned.

To say that the Wyoming people were indignant is to state the case mildly. Three days later, Congressman Barrett introduced his bill to abolish by congressional action the so called monument order. I hope his bill will pass—and I think it will. To my mind, the order creating the Jackson Hole monument represents just about the last word in executive arrogance.

This same identical thing can happen in Oregon. I was about to say it can happen unless we are on guard. But if an order is issued like the Jackson Hole order was being on guard will do no good. That just happened instantly and without warning. It is well known, at least in southern Oregon, that the National Park service has planned for several years to ultimately include the Crater Lake National park. In fact, there is an unpublicized plan in existence which contemplates the creation of a park area out of the Cascade range from the Canadian border straight through to California.

I doubt very much if anyone other than the employees of the Park service wants any more national park area in Oregon. The Park service is a fine organization. Our wonderful national parks are well administered. But park regulations are too strict for our wilderness areas. We need the forest lands for grazing. We want to hunt and fish in them. We want to enter them at will and without paying an entrance fee for the privilege. I serve notice right now that if we are ever surprised with an executive order affecting Oregon like the Jackson Hole sneaker hit Wyoming, I shall immediately do just what Congressman Barrett did—introduce a bill to kill the order by congressional action.

A first term congressman is not expected or supposed to do much talking on the floor of the house. This is not a rule, it is merely a custom. But I didn't come here to keep still when I had something I thought worth saying—so I made a speech on the floor last Tuesday. The purpose of my discussion was to call attention to the need of adequate funds for forest fire protection—this year of all years. The appropriation bill is now before congress. I used what I think is a new angle in that I pointed out the very definite need of using our forests—more especially the waste material from the forests—to meet our present shortages of alcohol and protein feed. Yes, it is possible to feed cattle and chickens from sawdust but I can't take space here to give the details. I'll be glad to send a copy of the speech, which contains the whole story, to anyone who will write and ask for it. Just as most of the other congressmen do, I am going to mail out quite a number of reprints (which I paid for in cash) because I think this subject of the utilization of wood waste is a matter of great importance to Oregon.

Tuesday I was given another committee assignment. I am now a member of the house "committee on Mines and Mining." Already a member of "Public Lands" and secretary of the republican Congressional Food Study committee and one of its sub-committee chairmen, I now have a line-up of committee assignments that is just about perfectly tailored to the needs of our district. The lands committee deals with forests, lumbering, and grazing; the mines committee deals with mining and mineral development and the food study committee is very close to the problems of farming and food production, as well as being concerned with consumer problems.

store for you, but we'll also tell you about that tomorrow. Besides, having a day chopped off the front of the week certainly gives up the works and we have to do some pretty fast traveling today to get caught up so until tomorrow then, this is it.
