

King Cotton is Dethroned; Tree, Cow Raising Tops

SUNRISE, Miss.—(AP)—J. P. (Print) Carter, 75-year-old cattleman of this community, raises cows and trees in a crop combination unique in a region where men long have been back-bent before King Cotton.

His 2,052 acres of cultivated young timber this week were described by a timber cruising crew of state forestry experts as "the finest we've ever seen," and herds of white face cattle grazing the forest lands have made Carter one of the most successful men in this area—how successful, he says, "is strictly my business."

"Cows and timber," Carter says, "go hand in hand. The cattle keep the thick undergrowth trampled and eaten down, letting the tender young grass get started in the spring. The cows eat the grass from around the baby trees, letting them grow. The big trees offer the cattle shade in the summer and shelter in the winter."

Of his model timber growth Carter says: "I'm as tickled over this timber as a little boy with a pair of red shoes. I'm in it every day. If I'm not walking amongst my pines I'm riding amongst them. It ain't work like plowing and hoeing and grubbing and sweating and praying for rain. It's fun watching this timber grow."

And manpower shortages mean nothing to Carter. "Land," he says, "and the timber and cattle it produces are what I love. I lived and slaved nearly three-quarters of a century before I realized that land would make a living for a man without him trying to scratch cotton and peas out of it."
