Lifting Device Facilitates Task in Lumber Mill

By PAUL JENKINS

Shown above is Laurance Burgess, operating a h'ister—a Ross lift truck—at the Roseburg Lumber company sawmill in East Roseburg. This truck's function is to lift whole stacks of green lumber from various units of the mill, transport them to low especially built kiln cars operating on railroad tracks of their own, and elevate them one upon the other, and side by side, until the cars are loaded to capacity.

Eight tracks lead into two large dry kilns, four tracks to the kiln. The loaded cars are pushed into the kilns by the h'ister and there the lumber is subjected to heat, both dry and moist, at a temperature of approximately 160 degrees, for about seven days.

When dry it is removed and transported to the planer, again by means of the handy little h'ister. The kilns hold an average of 600,000 feet of lumber.

The American officers, prior to the game, asked their commanding officer whether they should hold down their score and not beat the Chinese too badly.
