PARATYPHOID INFECTION

Recently Dr. Dickinson of O. S. C. has sent out circular letters to a number of turkey growers regarding the increased prevalence of paratyphoid infection in broods of young poult. The disease has also been diagnosed in chicks in Douglas County. Dr. Dickinson recommends that all flocks in which this disease is found be put on the market as meat birds, and that under no circumstances should they be used as breeding flocks. This recommendation applies to both turkeys and chickens.

The disease is quite similar to pullorum, and is transmitted in much the same way. Mortality in young chicks and poult is often very heavy, and as in the case of pullorum, there are always quite a number of "runts" left over, which serve as carriers, and transmit the disease to healthy birds later in life.

There is no satisfactory treatment. And while we are able to prevent pullorum by rigid testing and conscientious co-operation among growers, hatcheries, and others connected with the industry, we are not so fortunate regarding paratyphoid. As Dr. Dickinson says, "It is unfortunate that the agglutination test as used at present is not a highly efficient way of detecting carriers of this disease."

He also states that unless obtained we may be faced with "harsh regulations in order to get results." We might also add that while the necessity for these "harsh regulations" is building up, a lot of turkey growers and poultrymen are going to suffer heavy mortality in day old birds. In other words, only after much bitter experience will a law be demanded. It will be much cheaper to whip this disease ourselves than to have to resort to legislation. If in doubt, send in some chick or poult to Dr. Dickinson Oregon State College, Corvallis, Ore.

IF YOU BUY FEED, next to your best bargain.

Enteritis in turkeys

Every year, enteritis takes a heavy toll in young turkeys all over the country. "Enteritis" is not a specific disease, but is a word meaning "inflammation of the intestines." There is always a reason for its appearance, but it is sometimes difficult for a grower or even a fieldman to put his finger on the reason.

It may be coccidiosis, blackhead, or some other specific disease is the cause, or it may be just improper management in some form. Dr. Hinshaw of California says sometimes such a simple thing as failure of poult to find water troughs in a new location has brought on a case of enteritis. A writer in the latest "Norbest Turkey News" suggests that very fine ground feed may be very detrimental to young turkeys.

The Douglas Flour Mill has known for years that turkeys of all ages require much more fiber than do chicks. We have used a coarse grind in all our poultry mashes for years, because a coarse ground feed is better utilized than fine ground. Mother Nature gave chickens and turkeys a gizzard for the purpose of grind feed.

Some growers object to a few oat hulls showing up in starter feeds, but as this Norbest writer suggests, "turkeys are built to transform coarse feed into meat, and when the ration is too concentrated digestive troubles almost always result." We don't think oat hulls ever killed a poult, and we know all poult will do better with plenty of fiber than without. Three good reasons for green feed for turkeys are: FIBER, vitamins and proteins.

SACKS SCARCE AGIN

It seems we never have too many sacks, and often not enough. Right now is another time when we are getting close to short on them. If you have any empty sacks, PLEASE bring them in and let us put them to work again. Every returned sack brings you a dime, and helps to keep down the cost of feed to you and your neighbors.

FERMESOL

We have some very good reports on the new milk substitute. Diluted ten to one and used as a drink, or five to one and used to moisten mash, or soaked rolled barley, it is an appetizer and a food combined. Its high vitamin content makes it an excellent tonic, especially after an outbreak of disease which lowers vitality, and weakens the digestive tract.

HEY! PROFESSOR!

Colonel, (pointing to cigaret stub on company headquarters floor). "Soldier, is that yours?"
Soldier, (pleasantly): No, go ahead, sir, you saw it first!"
Three men each paid a waiter $10 for some whiskey. On that amount of liquor the proprietor was willing to cut the total price by $5, so gave the waiter five dollar bills as a refund.

The waiter gave each of the men a dollar bill and kept two for himself. Now, the whiskey, after the dollar rebate, cost each man $9. Three times $9 is $27. Adding the $2 that the waiter kept makes $29. What became of the other dollar?

CHARGE IT

A young bride walked busily into the bank and addressed the cashier. "I want to open an account with your bank."
The cashier asked politely, "Do you want a savings account or a checking account?"
"Neither one, she blithely replied. "I want a charge account you know, — like I have at the grocery store!"
