POSTWAR AIR EXPRESS

By Charles V. Stanton

SPEAKING at Portland, P. H. Cummings, New York, air traffic representative for the Railway Express agency, predicts transportation of many of Oregon's perishable agricultural products to eastern market by air express in the postwar period.

Air express was used quite extensively by turkey growers in shipping poult and eggs. The floral and nursery industries have made good use of aerial transportation.

Aeronautical science, has now produced new types of equipment, as a result of war demands, and planes are in existence today which can handle heavy and bulky freight at comparatively low costs.

Oregon's agriculture is in a position to profit substantially if progressive steps are taken to secure fullest advantage from opportunities offered by new transportation methods.

There is no finer fresh fruit in the world than an Italian, petite or date prune fully ripened on the tree.

By air express, prunes picked in Douglas county orchards could be placed in New York markets within 24 hours.

It is possible that the coming of air transportation will revive Douglas county's prune industry, once our greatest source of income.

Here in the Umpqua valley we grow the world's finest cantaloupe. Tests have shown its sugar content to be higher than in melons grown in any other locality.

It is possible that the coming of air transportation will revive Douglas county's prune industry, once our greatest source of income.

Through aerial transportation we can build new markets. There is never an over-production of agricultural products.

Equipment and manpower for air express will be available after the war to every community that provides the local accommodations required to permit normal and economical operation.
