One job we haven't finished in 54 years

1 In 1890, we started building the Union Oil refinery system. Today, 54 years later, we're still building it. Our "plant" has never been finished. And it probably never will be. Of course, we've thought it was, from time to time.

2 Back in 1919, we put in several million dollars worth of new equipment that gave us the last word in straight run refining. Yet during the next 7 years we installed cracking plants that greatly improved our production. This should have held us for a while.

3 But 13 years later... in 1939, we began a $6,000,000 plant that utilized hydroforming. Then we built a $26,000,000 plant to produce 100 octane. And today, we're installing a $12,000,000 catalytic cracking unit. Now obviously no one likes to spend that kind of money on new equipment when the old would probably "do" for several years.

4 But you can't stop improving a refinery in America and stay in business. Competition won't let you. Each new refining process that's developed either lowers costs or improves quality. And there's always some company willing to install that process so that they can go after your customers with better products or lower prices.

5 Consequently, you either keep your tools sharp or you don't whittle. As a result... American oil companies in the last 25 years have doubled the amount of gasoline they can make per barrel of crude, raised the quality of gasoline to 100 octane and over...

6 ...lowered the price from 29.7c a gallon to 13.4c (excluding tax) and outproduced all the rest of the world combined. Without competition this could never have happened. For no monopoly—private or governmental—has ever had the incentive to achieve such a record.
