Alexander Kipnis

Famous singers have been launched on their careers in various startling ways. But Alexander Kipnis has the unique distinction of getting his start in opera in a German prison camp.

During the last war the famous bass baritone, who will be heard by the Roseburg Community Concert association next Wednesday night, March 7th, at 8:15 o'clock at the Junior high school auditorium, was a young student in Berlin, whose musical goal was primarily conducting, not singing.

At the outbreak of war, the Russian-born youth was seized with other enemy aliens. After a brief term in solitary confinement he was sent to a concentration camp on an old exercise ground, where horses of the Prussian officers were given their work-outs.

The food in the camp was bad and the men slept on primitive bedding. Worst of all, they didn't know what would happen next and were completely shut out from all communication with families and friends on the outside.

However, there was no deliberately brutal treatment. Proof that their ill-fate was human came on a day when Kipnis was singing to amuse himself—singing because he was Russian and sad. Suddenly the German colonel in charge of the camp appeared beside him. "Have you sung professionally?" he snapped. "No, sir," said Kipnis. "Would you like to?" "Yes, sir," stammered the bewildered prisoner. "My brother is manager of the state opera house in Wiesbaden," announced the colonel. "Would you like to sing in Wiesbaden?" Kipnis would. "My brother will be here in the morning to give you an audition," the colonel said, marching away. The startled Kipnis thought it impossible—but the opera manager came and it was the beginning of his operatic career that has made him one of the greatest bass baritones of all time.

After his Wiesbaden contract expired and the war ended, Kipnis became one of the leading singers in the European music capitals. He was star of the Wagner festivals in Bayreuth and the principal basso of the Vienna state opera. Following his appearance in New York with the Wagnerian festival company, he achieved sensational popularity in this country. After tremendously successful concert tours in the U. S., Austria and Australia, he made his debut at the Metropolitan opera and has since become one of the major stars of the company.

This war also influenced the bass baritone's career. When Hitler's troops effected the Anschluss, Alexander Kipnis was the most popular singer in Austria, and needed only to announce the date of a recital to get a sold-out house within 48 hours. He was by that time an American citizen, with an American wife, and could have continued his Viennese engagements unmolested. He chose without hesitation, however, to radio his withdrawal from both Vienna and Salzburg.

Looking back on it all, Kipnis thinks it particularly odd that he not only started his career in a prison camp, but a German prison camp. "It's not something you could count on happening to day," he says wryly.
