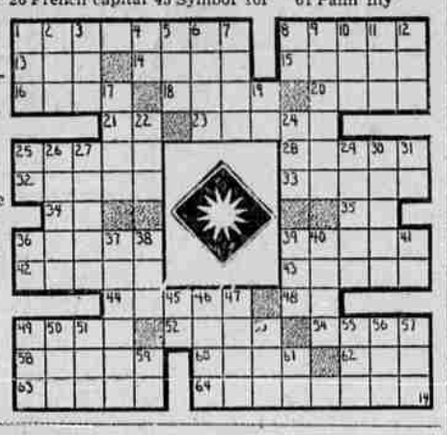
Answer to Previous Puzzle



Fruits of Oppression

Washington News From an Inside View

Argument, Sentiment, Comment

By HARRIS ELLSWORTH
Congressman, Fourth Oregon District

Last week I made a very hurried visit to the West Coast and was in my district about thirty-six hours.

When congress recessed for Easter, I was offered an opportunity to ride out to the coast in an army plane which was making the trip and had several spare seats in it. So, I became an aerial hitch-hiker, and in the course of nine days elapsed time, I average about 1,000 miles a day.

Traveling in army airplanes was an interesting and enlightening experience. The army, of course, does not send airplanes at the beck and call of the members of congress, but members, being officials of the government, generally are welcome to ride in service planes if there is room. I had the good fortune to line up a ride with a colonel who took a half a dozen members of his staff out to San Francisco and Los Angeles and back on a technical mission. The plane was a large two-motor ship, but it was not the last word in comfort. In its active service days, it was a paratrooper ship, and probably was in use on the African desert, since it was painted brown with desert camouflage. The seats were benches along the sides, and they were not upholstered. After having spent more than thirty hours in this plane, I realize that the job of a paratrooper is a hard one in more ways than one.

There is nothing haphazard about cross-country flights of service airplanes. The air highways are as carefully designated as motor highways. All flights are scheduled in advance, cleared by the weather section, and are made according to plan.

Nor are army pilots reckless dare-devils, who zoom around in big airplanes with abandon. On the contrary, these pilots and crews were serious, careful and highly-trained young men. Without exception, they are proud of their service and of their individual records. Every detail of every flight is checked and double-checked. The airplane is in constant touch with the ground by radio at all times during flight. The pilot is informed on weather conditions. Planes do not fly if there is weather trouble on the course, and such flights are made only during daylight hours, although all planes are equipped for night flying.

People are pretty much the same everywhere you find them in this broad country of ours. One thing we all have is a feeling that the part of the country we call "home" is just a little better than any other place in the nation. I feel, for example, that the Pacific coast, and especially the southern part of Oregon, is by long odds the only really livable part of the United States. Most of the young officers with whom I made this trip live in the east, and I was amused at their conversation as we left the airplane at Bolling field after having made the trip back here from the West coast. As we were walking out to the car, one of them said to the other: "Boy, doesn't this air feel good? It's certainly grand to be back here. I didn't like that Pacific coast country at all."

Then, they proceeded to admire the trees and shrubbery as we drove into town, noting how much better they like this part of the United States as compared to where they had just been. I kept quiet, but the fact of the matter was, my feeling was exactly the opposite. I very definitely missed the fresh, clean tang of the Pacific coast air, and could see no virtue in what I found here. Perhaps this love of home, possessed by all of the people from wherever they may come in our great country, is one of the things which makes this nation great.
