able at the police station in the district in which you reside, which in this writer's case happens to be the station at Piccadilly Place, two shillings' worth away by cab.

FIRST you have to have a certificate of registration — to which must be attached the same foul portrait that appears in your passport, thus leaving you always with an uneasy feeling in the pit of your stomach that after the authorities have duly scanned it they will decide that as responsible officials of the British empire it is their clear duty to order you deported as a suspicious character. This certificate goes into the intimate deetails of your past life in a meticulous manner and includes several blank pages headed "Endorsements and Remarks." This leaves you with the wholesome conviction that you'd better walk the straight and narrow path with blameless rectitude, as otherwise the police might start jotting down details that could conceivably get back to your home town and cause a lot of trouble.

WITH your certificate of registration out of the way, you start to work on your identity card, which recapitulates much of the data recited in your certificate of identification, and winds up with blanks for giving your new address if you move. You must have these cards in your possession at all times, and if requested by a police officer in uniform or a member of his majesty's armed forces in uniform and on duty you must produce them. If you are absent from your domicile more than 14 days, you must go around to the police station and explain why.

Both contain the printed statement that any breach of the requirements, including failure to give accurate information about yourself, is an offense punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both.

Remembering that the British have what to us Americans seems an almost curious regard for the sanctity of the law, you start off your career as an alien resident in a chastened and humble mood.

AS soon as you are equipped with the necessary police credentials, you head for the ration board—which is a local committee operating under the ministry of food and corresponds almost identically with our ration boards—to get your ration boook. It sits in a huge hall—in this case historic Caxton hall. Since it is less than a week until new ration books must be obtained by everybody, there is a crowd waiting. It isn't a standing queue, such as you see everywhere in London. The hall is filled with seats, and everyone moves up each time an applicant is taken care of. It takes about an hour and a half, including the waiting time. As an alien just arrived, you get what is left of the old book and the new one as well.

British rationing is much closer than ours. In addition to sugar, meat, butter, fats, cheese and canned goods, milk and eggs are rationed. The present ration of eggs in the shell is two per week. Pretty slim. The ration, of course, is supplemented by powdered eggs. All clothing is rationed—rigidly. So are sweets. You don't just walk in and buy candy. You pungle up coupons for it—as long as they last.

Curious enough, one hears no talk here in London of black market.

THERE is another rationing difference. If you are a householder, you don't trot around and spend your precious food coupons wherever your fancy dictates. You register with ONE grocer, and you do your business with HIM—and him alone. He is responsible for supplying you. The fact that he knows how many customers he has to take care of simplifies his problem considerably.

As an alien resident you park your ration book with your hotel, but you are allowed to eat around if you choose—and can find a restaurant open. That is something of a problem, for a lot of them close right after tea.

ALL of this rigamarole that must be gone through with sounds annoying in the extreme. It would be but for the obvious efficiency and the truly delightful courtesy of British officials. It isn't just put-on courtesy. It isn't hands-across-the-sea courtesy. It is genuine. It isn't confined to the top. It goes all the way down.

It contrasts sharply with the ABSENCE of courtesy that is spreading so alarmingly in America under the strain of war. And one has to remember that these British have been at war for nearly six years.

A VALUABLE CONTRIBUTION

By Charles V. Stanton

Douglas county blood donors should feel very proud of their first year's achievements. More than 700 pints of blood were donated by persons participating in organized excursions to the Portland blood bank, although each trip required 400 or more miles of travel and expense of an overnight stay in Portland. Also to be commended are the scores of persons and organizations who contributed a total of $1,643.49 to meet transportation costs. We imagine few better community records are to be found anywhere in the nation.

When residents of Douglas county learned that equipment could not be brought into the county to take blood, prospective donors were organized to go to the Portland plasma center.

Mrs. Violet C. Hannon, executive-secretary of the Douglas county chapter of the American Red Cross, organized the first trip, made Aug. 29, 1944. Mrs. Hannon was given $240 from the chapter's treasury to pay transportation costs of the first two trips.

When no more trips could be financed by the chapter, the News-Review launched a "Blood Money" campaign, which started Sept. 22, 1944. So whole-hearted was the response to this appeal, it became necessary Oct. 4, only 12 days after the campaign was opened, to call a halt, as contributions were sufficient to finance blood donor trips through the winter season, or as long as had been originally planned.

Contributions amounting to more than $1,000 were handled by the News-Review in its "Blood Money" appeal, the fund being turned over to Mrs. Hannon to be used exclusively for transportation of blood donors.

But donations to the fund did not end there. Some individuals learned of people desiring to donate blood but lacking money to pay for their meals and hotel room in Portland. So another special fund was formed by a few persons who financed "proxies." Donations from individuals and clubs continued to pour in, so that transportation money has made possible from one to two trips every month, except January when the proposed excursion was canceled because of weather conditions.

Altogether 15 bus loads of blood donors from various Douglas county communities have gone to Portland, in addition to 17 trips by passenger cars, a total of more than 700 persons being furnished with transportation.

With the exception of the original appropriation of $240 for the first two trips, this activity has been maintained throughout the year without cost to the Red Cross chapter, as all expenses have been met from contributions and donations to the special fund.

Roseburg aerie of the Eagles lodge is financing the "Anniversary" trip of blood donors August 17. Unless otherwise requested by the receiving center at Portland, this probably will be the last organized excursion, Mrs. Hannon states, as no plans have been made to carry on the activity unless the need for blood in the Pacific war becomes more urgent.

Busses for the Anniversary run will leave the Roseburg armory at 8 A. M., Friday, Aug. 17, and will return Sunday, Aug. 19, giving donors Friday evening and all day Saturday in Portland. Donors are now being registered for the birthday trip by Mrs. Hannon, president of the Douglas County Blood Donors club, at the Armory.

The more than 700 pints does not, of course, represent all of Douglas county's participation in blood-giving. It has been the practice of businessmen and persons visiting in Portland to go voluntarily to the blood center. Other groups have traveled in private cars to various cities in the Willamette valley to contact mobile units.

Considering the distance traveled, the personal expense involved, loss of time, etc., we feel that residents of Douglas county have made a very valuable and patriotic contribution.

CARD OF THANKS

Pvt. Robt. P. Bylund With Fighting 69th

Proud that he was a member of the "Fighting Sixty-ninth," New York state's old National Guard, Pfc. Robert P. Bylund, of Roseburg, is a patient at McCaw General hospital, Walla Walla, Wash.

Entering the service in Feb., 1944, Bylund went overseas in September to Oahu and the New Hebrides, training in jungle fighting. He was a member of an infantry regiment composed of members of the old "Fighting Sixty-ninth," which by the time he joined them, were veterans of Makin, Saipan and Eniwetok.

Bylund served as machine gunner for sixty-one days on Okinawa. After weeks of fighting heavy concentrations of artillery, hand to hand combat, and cave fighting in the southern end of the island, he joined the forces in the mopping up on the northern end of Okinawa until he suffered fatigue.

After hospitalization on Okinawa, he was flown to the United States, arriving at Letterman General hospital early in July. He is high in praise of the hospital care and the general treatment received from San Francisco people who gave them such a royal reception upon their arrival there.

Native Enmity Overcome

Bylund describes northern Okinawa as similar to Oregon in terrain and climate. At first the natives were fiercely antagonistic but after a few of them had been fed and their wounds treated by the Yanks they went back to the hills spreading the news and many came to them for food and help. The children soon learned American sports and it was not uncommon to see them playing around the rest areas and hospitals.

Bylund wears the Asiatic-Pacific ribbon with one star, Good Conduct Medal and the Combat Infantryman's Badge.

He expects to go on furlough and join his wife, Iris and two children at their home at 1441 East 24th Street, Eugene, Ore. His parents Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Bylund, live in Roseburg. A brother, A-C Richard Bylund, is training with the Army air force at Kessler field, Mississippi.

Mr. Carr had been employed for a number of years with the Coos Bay Lumber company.

Vet Freed Of Theft Count After Examination Here

Perrine, a jockey and discharged veteran, has been released from custody and returned to his parents in Minnesota, following examination at the Veterans hospital in Roseburg, according to a report by police at Gresham, Ore. Perrine had been arrested on a charge of auto theft. He was sent to Roseburg for examination and the report from the hospital was presented before the grand jury which returned a not true bill.
