Shakers used in Oregon, most of which have been home or custom made, can be classified in two general types, Huber explains. One is the pull type that uses a flexible cable and hook to connect the power unit and the tree. The other is the push or boom type with positive motion both directions.

There is no established design among the shakers used in Oregon, says Huber. The design to be used depends upon the kind of tractor available, the material to be had, and the ingenuity and mechanical ability of the builder.

The shakers can be mounted on either a wheeled or tracklaying type of tractor, and may be operated either from a power take-off or by a separate engine power unit. The cable type, which is probably the easier to make, requires two men to operate—one to place the hook and the other to run the tractor.

Huber advises making sure that the shaking mechanism is strong enough and mounted so as to be able to absorb the tractor's maximum pull. While no printed directions have been issued for constructing a shaker, either Huber or county agents in prune

Mechanical Prune Shakers Found to Be Labor Savers

More and more Oregon prune growers are turning to mechanical tree shakers as a means of saving thousands of hours of hard labor reports M. G. Huber, extension agricultural engineer at Oregon State College.

Huber says reports indicate that mechanical shakers save at least one-half and frequently more of the time usually required in hand shaking. F. E. Bullock and Son of Oakland say that two men operating their power shaker will even shake as many prunes in two hours as eight men could do in a day by the hand method.

Trees can be cleaned as well by mechanical shakers as by hand, general reports indicate. When prunes are picked twice or will even shake the mechanical shaker will clean off more of the ripe fruit the first time over than hand shaking. Gene Fisher, Kellogg prune grower, found this to be the case.
