

School Lunches Continued; Funds Needed in Oregon

The school lunch program, with its dual objectives of better health for children and wider markets for farm products, became permanent with the enactment of the National School Lunch act this month, according to E. Harvey Miller, Oregon director of the Production and Marketing Administration, United States Department of Agriculture.

Operation of the program within the states is turned over to state agencies by the new legislation, which also provides federal assistance to states on a matching-of-funds basis.

This means that the state Production and Marketing Administration office no longer will administer the school lunch program in Oregon," Miller said.

"Federal assistance to local school lunch programs this coming school year is dependent upon the State Department of Education assuming responsibility for the program in Oregon."

Funds Applied For

Rex Punnam, state superintendent of public instruction, has announced that his department is willing to take over operation of the program, but lacks the necessary administrative funds. He said that an application has been made to the state emergency board for an emergency appropriation of about $18,000 to operate the program for the 1946-47 school year.

During the past school year, 6,347,653 hot lunches were served to 50,966 children in 392 Oregon schools, Miller reported. Schools in all but four Oregon counties participated. About two-thirds of the cost of the lunches, $881,091, was contributed by the children and by local sponsors—Parent-Teacher Associations, school districts, community clubs and other groups. Federal assistance amounted to $459,063.35, an average of less than 8 cents a meal. More than 200 local sponsoring groups already have requested participation during the coming school year.

"The adoption of the National School Lunch act opens a new door to the improvement of our farm future," Miller said. "Adequate and nutritious lunches for our children mean improved health and an immediate market for quantities of food that otherwise might have to be diverted to non-food uses. At the same time our children are educated to a higher standard of nutrition—which is just another way of saying a higher standard of consumption of farm products."

Migrants Seek Oregon Farm Jobs

As Oregon farmers ready themselves for the final lap of the 1946 harvest, J. R. Beck, state supervisor of the O. S. C. extension service emergency farm labor program, reports that labor has not been a limiting factor in the harvest thus far although a good deal of shifting has been necessary by harvest followers to relieve temporary labor shortages.

The fact that the Pacific coast states pay the best farm wages in the United States has been a major factor in relieving the wartime shortage of harvest workers.

Beck indicates. Figures released by California check stations recently indicated that approximately three times the number of persons were arriving in that state now as compared with the war years when the defense plants were recruiting workers from eastern states.

Washington and Oregon are also getting an unprecedented influx of out-of-state workers this year. Many of these new arrivals are working on farm harvest jobs, Beck states.

Housing is still a major attraction for harvest followers. In this respect, Beck says, the migrant camps located in some of the high labor requirement areas are proving valuable in attracting farm help.
