Oregon Traffic Deaths Decrease

Oregon's traffic death rate struck a two-year low in February, it has been announced by Secretary of State Farrell.

The rate—deaths per 100,000 miles of auto travel—slumped from last year's average of 10.6 to 6.0. The actual number of lives lost was the lowest for any February in several years, while car mileage mounted to an all-time February high. The result was the least traffic danger since June 1945.

"We shouldn't be misled by this figure, however," said Farrell. "It is only a sign of what can be done when everyone works together to cut down driving danger. The battle against traffic deaths and injuries has a long way to go."

He pointed out that, as a whole, the state's cities have done a good job of holding the safety line against the rising tide of traffic. By contrast, however, the highways outside any city or town are now accounting for three out of four traffic deaths. Virtually all the increase in post-war fatalities has been on the open road.

"Rural deaths can't be expected to drop much until we protect the highway with a reasonable number of police," Farrell said. "It's only sensible to use the additional income from bigger traffic volume to keep that traffic in line."
