D. D. T. Protects Garden From All But Four Insects

There is small excuse for any home gardener to complain about insect injury to his vegetable garden, since D.D.T. became available. By dusting every week or two with D.D.T. of at least 3% strength, insect injury can be prevented except in the following cases:

Mexican bean beetles, tomato horn worm, and most aphids are immune to D.D.T.

Cucumbers, melons and squash may be injured by D.D.T., so it is advisable to use other means to kill the cucumber beetles, which attack all these, and squash bugs and borers, which concentrate on squash plants.

To take care of these exceptions, rotenone will serve. It destroys the Mexican bean beetle, and is deadly to aphids, while even less toxic than D.D.T. to animals.

Some gardeners may prefer to use nicotine sulphate against aphids and some form of arsenic to kill cucumber beetles, which is a particularly difficult pest.

While highly poisonous, these older insecticides have been used safely for many years, by many millions of gardeners; and with the usual precautions may still be used.

But the gardener equipped with D.D.T. and rotenone, with suitable equipment for either dusting or spraying his crops when they are threatened, but before damage has been done, will be far better armed to repel insect invasion than he could have been in the prewar era, however extensive his insecticide inventory may have been.

Less Harmless Than Rotenone
D.D.T. is not so harmless to humans, as rotenone. In the form of dust, or as a wettable powder, which is mixed with water for spraying, there is no danger to the user. But residues which might remain on the edible parts of vegetables when they are harvested should be avoided.

Wash carefully all vegetables which have been sprayed or dusted with it, and do not apply it to leaf crops, or the edible parts of other crops during the two weeks before harvest.

Dust beans with D.D.T. to kill the leaf hoppers, which in many sections are more destructive than bean beetles. D.D.T. injury to vine crops may be avoided by great care. A single puff of dust directed at the base of squash plants weekly, after they had reached their third leaves, is reported to have kept away squash borers, without injury to the vines.

Some gardeners report good results against the cucumber beetle and squash borer by covering the soil near the base of the plant with D.D.T. dust. The insects frequently walk on the soil, and any contact with D.D.T. will be fatal to them.
