Lewis' Attitude Puts His Union In Difficult Spot

WASHINGTON, Oct. 20.—(AP)—District 50 of the United Mine Workers, the catch-all union John L. Lewis threatens to use anew in waging organizational war on rival labor groups, is in a tight spot.

It lacks any chance for National Labor Relations Board support. The way has been cleared for all AFL unions to make use of NLRB facilities if their leaders wish, and the heads of virtually all federation affiliates have indicated they will take such necessary qualifying steps by signing non-communist certificates.

But Lewis' refusal to meet any of the Taft-Hartley Act requirements in his all-out opposition to the law leaves his district perched on a shaky limb. It plainly will have to fight hard to hold on to what it has now, let alone make inroads on other unions.

One district 50 official familiar with the problems involved expresses the opinion that Lewis' miscellaneous union will have to win heavy employer backing to survive.

That is not to suggest that any Lewis union would be a "company union." But it does mean that without recourse to collective bargaining elections through the NLRB each district 50 union will have to depend on overwhelming strength of numbers in a shop or plant to convince the boss that it has the majority required to force a contract.

Elections don't have to be held through the NLRB. They can be—and some now—held by agreement between the union and employers, frequently with a disinterested third party directing the secret balloting.

The UMW itself is in the same position as district 50 so far as access to the NLRB is concerned, because Lewis and his fellow UMW officers have declined to sign the required non-communist affidavits. However, the UMW has barely used the NLRB for the reason that in recent years its bargaining rights have seldom been challenged.

In the event an employer or disgruntled mine worker filed a complaint against the UMW, Lewis could then be haled before the board. But the union itself can't institute cases so long as Lewis maintains his refusal to comply with the eligibility requirements.
