laborers quote him further as follows:

"Just as the Soviet Union has always stood for improvement of political and economic relations with all countries, so it now stands for such improvement, BEGINNING WITH THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN."

"If these countries wish to improve relations with the Soviet Union, they will be welcomed. We shall be prepared to go forward to meet them irrespective of what the economic set-up in those countries may be."

Those are fair words.

If they were backed up (now or later) by equally fair DEEDS, the future of the world would be safe.

No sensible person can doubt that with good will and fair dealing on BOTH SIDES Russian communism and Western free enterprise could get along together peacefully forever.

COMPETITION, so long as it refrains from the use of BRUTE FORCE to DESTROY a competitor, is a great influence for progress in this world.

So far the tune played by these Englishmen after their conference with Stalin has been all sweet harmony. Here comes the sour note:

One of their number (a Mr. Konni Zilliacus, a rather odd name as English names go) said, apparently after the others got through talking to the correspondents, that Stalin ADDED: "If America and Britain do not want to settle differences (with Russia), WE SHALL WAIT UNTIL THEY REGAIN THEIR REASON."

THERE are two ways to settle differences.

One is by the process of give and take, resulting in a fair agreement that both parties intend to live up to and DO live up to. The other is ONE PARTY KNUCKLING UNDER TO THE OTHER PARTY.

Stalin's postscript, as reported by Mr. Zilliacus, sounds suspiciously like a THREAT.

OVER and over, in the years recently past, we have been enthralled and immensely comforted by conciliatory statements made by Stalin to somebody or other who has questioned him and reported his answers. In these interviews, his WORDS have been uniformly fair and reasonable.

But always our relations with Russia, as influenced by Russian deeds, have gone on worsening.

THIS time, harking back to the past, we'd better pray to the good Lord that now the strong man of Russia means what he says but meanwhile WED BETTER KEEP OUR POWDER DRY.

This insignificant writer can't escape the conclusion that if Russia decides to get along with us, instead of trying to put us out of business, it will be because she thinks we are too tough to be tackled safely.

WE DIDN'T DO IT

By CHARLES V. STANTON

Because we had a minor part in securing legislation restricting salmon fishing commercially on the Umpqua River at the last session of the state legislature, some people are accusing us of having a hand in repeal of the law which previously permitted taking three trout, 10 inches or more in length, from the Umpqua River during the winter season.

We hasten to disclaim any part in that piece of legislation. We endeavored to talk members of the Game Commission out of sponsoring their request for repeal, but did not succeed in convincing them that cancellation of the privilege was not a good conservation move.

Heretofore winter fishermen have been permitted to retain three trout of more than 10 inches. It is claimed, perhaps with knowledge, that many fishermen abused this privilege, not only taking more than three fish, but also keeping undersized trout.

Fish more than 10 inches in length, except steelhead, are generally sea-run cutthroat trout. The sea-run cutthroat, better known in Oregon as the salmon trout, is diminishing rapidly in all our coastal streams.

Last year's local campaign resulted in $3,800 worth of subscriptions in 10 days, for a gross profit to the school of $1,424, $300 of which was taken out for purchase of special student prizes.

Another factor is that it prevents trout fishermen from wading over shallow spawning beds and disturbing salmon nests, as many fishermen in late fall fishing find use of single eggs on bars where salmon are spawning to be very effective.

Fall and winter fishing in the Umpqua River is principally for steelheads. This is one of the finest sports offered by the stream, and, in late years, there have been abundant steelhead runs.

The winter steelhead ordinarily is taken on bait. Large clusters of salmon eggs are used. Invariably the steelhead fisherman will catch several trout, although he is primarily interested in steelheads only.

With repeal of the three-trout law, he must now return to the river any trout which he may take. Fish hooked on bait usually are hooked deeply. We doubt if many survive removal of the hook. Thus, a good many fish will be killed and wasted.

The question is whether the number of trout purposely taken under the old law, compared with those destroyed and wasted through operation of the current prohibition, will prove an act of conservation.

So-called trout, less than 10 inches, generally are small steelheads or salmon en route to salt water. If they are permitted to reach the ocean they will return later as adult fish to furnish better sport and more meat.

The problem has two sides and careful study of experience is necessary to determine whether conservation is served by the new prohibition, or whether the old system was better.

We do not know whether the change in law is for the better or worse. The main thing is that we do not want to be blamed by critical fishermen for enactment of the repeal. We made a feeble effort to stay repeal until the matter could be given further investigation, but the commission's experts were agreed it was a move in the direction of needed conservation, and, against that motive we would not voice an argument, although we might question effectiveness.

We are faced with enough criticism—which we admit is deserved—for loopholes in the Umpqua River closure bill. These loopholes resulted from determined and successful efforts to push through our bill in the closing hours of the legislature, when time was fast running out, and when opposition was intense.

The one-hour program to be presented by Gray includes music on his new Deagan Imperial marimba, saxophone novelties, whistling, clarinet, characterization readings and comedy.

We must commend some of the lower river packers and buyers who have consistently refused to buy from fishermen violating intent of the law. With exception of a few "die-hards," lower Umpqua fishermen and packers, for the most part, are observing both the letter and spirit of the net closure.

Meetings Set for School Teachers

Miss Dorothy Massey, in charge of the health and physical fitness program for the State Department of Education, will be the speaker at a one-day meeting for all elementary school teachers in Douglas County Friday, Oct. 24.

Both high school and elementary teachers are required, also.

Annual Magazine Sales Drive Set By Junior High

Roseburg Junior High School will launch its 11th annual magazine subscription drive Wednesday, Oct. 22, and close the project Nov. 4, Principal H. R. Brand announced today.

The drive, carried on solely by Junior High students, yearly aids in raising funds for securing special school equipment. It is sponsored this year by the Curtis Publishing Co., but includes 52 different magazines for which orders will be taken by students for subscriptions or renewals.

Brand stated that each year the school enters this commercial project with the feeling that the general public would rather be solicited done by their own pupils, rather than by professional canvassers, thus keeping the commissions here in Roseburg.

Goal this year is $3,500, with a super-goal of $4,000. Within the school, students, homeroom, and for individual, homeroom, and class merchandise awards.

Funds raised through the commission plan are used to purchase equipment for the school and aid the athletic program, the latter of which during the past few years has been carried through solely by funds of the drive.

Equipment procured through the project in previous years includes two motion picture machines, an inter-sound system, electric scoreboard, recording machine, and a new curtain for the auditorium's stage, as well as numerous smaller articles such as flags and library fixtures. Most of this year's profits will be used for further stage improvements.

Last year's local campaign resulted in $3,800 worth of subscriptions in 10 days, for a gross profit to the school of $1,424, $300 of which was taken out for purchase of special student prizes.

Roseburg was the highest competing school in three western states last year, and three years ago they won fourth place in 12 competing western states.

Farm Cooperation With Unions Urged by Tobin

PORTLAND, Oct. 21.—(AP)—Farmers and industrial laborers must learn to understand their mutual benefits in supporting each other, Daniel J. Tobin, general president of the AFL Teachers union, told a union assembly here last night.

The national union leader warned the audience that "every great boom" has been followed by a depression and said that labor must work to convince the American farmer of the need for cooperation to support wages that will purchase the farmers' crops.
