

Rebellious Wife Settles Question Of Annual Whoopee

By HAL BOYLE
NEW YORK—(AP)—Wilbur Peeble, thumping past newspaper headlines of world disaster to his favorite comic strip, inquired of his wife across the breakfast table:
"Well, Trellis Mae, I suppose everything is ready for the party."
"What party?" she replied grimly.
"Why our annual New Year's eve party tonight," said Wilbur. "Great Scott, you don't mean to say you haven't done anything about it!"
"I have not, and I don't intend to," said his rebellious wife. "In fact, we are not going to have a party."
Peeble put his paper down with a reluctant glance and inward thought—(oh, oh, this is going to be difficult).
"Don't try to argue with me, Wilbur, and wipe that spoiled child look off your face," said Trellis Mae, launching into a full offensive.

"Why, Honey!"
"No Shambles this Time
And don't you 'Honey' me! For the past ten years on New Year's eve I've let your fathered friends turn my house into a second battle of Gettysburg. This time we'd be going to go out on the town."
"But, Honey..."
"We're going to that new musical hit you've been promising to take me to since it opened three years ago"—She flourished the tickets she had already bought—and I've got a table for two reserved for us afterward at the Firefly Night Club."
"Honey, you know we can't afford all that," Wilbur complained.
"It'll cost about $50, including taxes," countered his embattled spouse. "What do you think it cost us to throw that party last year?"
"The maid came in the next day and took one look and quit. The place looked like Tokyo after the big fire raid. Remember that chum of yours who stood on his head and came down with both feet on the coffee table? And the two strangers he brought who played catch with fresh eggs and broke two on the living room wall. How about that dizzy red-head who insisted on trying on my fur coat and left the burning cigaret in the pocket?"
"But I've already invited everybody."
"How many?"
"Oh—about fifteen, maybe twenty."
Peeble saw he had lost the fight, but went down fighting. "It's too late now to let everybody know the party's called off," he said.
"I've thought of that," she said, pulling a small neatly lettered sign from a drawer. "We'll hang this on the door knob."
The sign said:
"You don't have to go home—but you can't stay here. Happy New Year!"
