mains—and with steaks what they are in modern life a good cow country is nothing to twiddle one's fingers at. As at Lakeview, the combination of cow country and modern industrial development have produced a town that is good to look at and agreeable to live in.

AN annual cut of 140 million feet is no mean present asset. But, you will be likely to ask, how long will it last?

Estimates vary. Maybe four or five years. But practical lumbermen and forest service people agree that it will stabilize at a sustained yield of around 50 million feet. By present standards, that could mean a considerable reduction in industrial employment, but already Prineville people are looking forward to the day when more complete processing of pine logs will yield more man hours per thousand feet. At the very least, they believe, the man hours per log that will be yielded by these newer methods will be doubled. If that is true, 50 million feet per year will provide a payroll not far off that which is now provided by 140 million feet per year. Being of an optimistic, rather than a pessimistic turn of mind, they think the increase in man hours brought by completer refining of the log will be much more than twofold.

So they are not worrying about the future. They are pretty sure that industrial progress will keep their payrolls GROWING.

WITHIN the normal retail radius of Prineville, there are now about 25,000 acres of rich land. This total can be increased by getting more water. The young men who now lead the chamber of commerce are already thinking in terms of more water to be gained by storage dams and generally better use of the flow of Crooked River and its tributaries.

More water will mean more acres and more intensive crop development. That, in its turn, will mean more man hours per acre. These young men and most of the older ones are convinced that the combination of more man hours per acre and more man hours per log will keep their town growing at a satisfactory rate.

They are building their plans for the future on that foundation.

YOU'VE heard, of course, of the Prineville municipal railroad and its little train that was known as the Galloping Goose. The road, running to Redmond, where it connects with the UP and the GN, was municipally financed and came in for a lot of ribbing. But it has paid out. Prineville's industrial growth has been largely built on this foundation.

It has been our custom too often in this country of laugh at pioneers who DO THINGS. The Galloping Goose is a bright and shiny example of the fairly dependable fact that it is better to do something than to sit tight and do nothing.

Anyway, Prineville is pretty well satisfied with the way things have worked out.

Highway Officials Hurt On Way to Hearing

COOS BAY, Ore., Jan. 23.—(AP)—A highway collision near here yesterday injured two state highway commission engineers en route to a legislative interim committee hearing here.

Oscar Cutler, engineer in charge of county and city work, suffered cuts on the face and a broken nose. His assistant, John W. Cattrall, was cut on the head. Both came to a hotel here after treatment.

GETTING FULL VALUE

By CHARLES V. STANTON

Malcom Epley, editor of The Herald and News, Klamath Falls, has been giving a great deal of publicity lately to the fact that logs from the Diamond Lake area of the Umpqua National Forest have started going through the plant of the Klamath Moulding Co.

Mac has had a good time needling us about Douglas County timber going into Klamath Falls and we haven't, even yet, been able to compose a snappy come-back. But we'll say this much for Mac, he has been giving us credit for the timber his community is getting from our forests, which is more than we can say concerning some of the other areas drawing heavily from the Umpqua Basin resource.

There is a good lesson in Klamath Falls' plight. That region once had a huge stand of timber. Because of the terrain and the demand for pine, the industry slashed at the resource until today little is left. A few foresighted operators, sufficiently capitalized to buy and hold large bodies of land, have a limited supply of timber left, but production has steadily declined until the timber industry is far less important in Klamath County's economy than it was a few years ago. Now the mills of the region are reaching out as far as they can extend to bring in materials needed to keep remaining plants in operation.

It is evident that it would not be economically feasible for the Klamath Moulding Co. to transport logs by truck to Yamsey siding, then load onto railroad cars and carry by rail to Klamath Falls if the logs were to be cut into timbers and boards. Such operations can be handled only by plants engaged in high-yield, specialty products.

The operation shows that operators in the Umpqua Basin are not getting full value out of our timber resource. Why, for instance, should we be producing timbers and boards only in the Umpqua Basin, paying an average of about $8 per thousand board feet stumpage, when specialty products will permit stumpage values as high as the $27 per thousand recently paid by a Willamette Valley concern? The answers, of course, are obvious: (1) The market will absorb only a certain amount of specialty product; and (2) there is a much greater market for timbers and boards, and (3) as long as a good profit is to be made in rough lumber, the industry will continue wasteful practices.

But we cannot escape the fact that our timber resource is not returning its highest economic value. Many products are bringing higher prices and better profits than timbers and boards. So far we have not developed in the Umpqua Basin the manufacturing facilities for turning out high-yield products. But such factories do exist elsewhere, which explains why the Eugene and Springfield districts can come into Douglas County, take our logs in competition with our own rough-cut sawmills, paying higher stumpage and transportation costs, and still make high profits.

Weyerhaeuser is preparing to drag Calapooia timber to Springfield for manufacture in a complete utilization plant. Later, according to present plants, timber from Weyerhaeuser's huge holdings on our side of the Coast Range will go to a plant to be built at North Bend. Our logs now are going to Coos Bay, to Portland, and even into the Puget Sound region.

Are we to sit by and let our resource be transported elsewhere, taking only low values while other communities reap manufacturing benefits from high value operation? Unless we are content with such condition, we better begin doing something about it.

Mac is welcome to the timber in the Diamond lake area. Every log going out of that region is one which needs harvesting. The Forest Service is permitting cutting only of ripe, mature trees, and is setting up its cutting operations to maintain sustained yield. It would be a good many years before we could provide facilities to harvest these trees, but we're serving notice on Mac right now that when we're ready for them, we're going after them, and his moulding company better be making its plans to move to the Umpqua Basin.

It won't be too long, we hope, until we have the pulp mills, remanufacturing plants, sash and door factories, furniture factories, chemical plants and other high-yield production units enabling us to handle our resource. Then these "outsiders" won't be able to overbid us on stumpage.

To Present Concert Tonight

For his success as one of the top-ranking violinists in the country today, Joseph Fuchs, who will appear for the Roseburg Community Concert Association at the Junior High School auditorium tonight, January 23, at eight-fifteen o'clock, is indebted perhaps more than anything else to a severe elbow injury which he received in early childhood.

As a boy of four, Joseph Fuchs fell and hurt his left arm, which resulted in a nerve injury. When the family doctor suggested daily exercises for his fingers in order to strengthen the muscles, Mr. Fuchs' father decided to have his son study the violin. This decision, however, was no mere accident—the Fuchs family had already become aware of their young son's remarkable musical talent.

At the age of two he could sing any tune he would hear—and in faultless pitch. Visitors to the New York City home of the Fuchs family were amazed at the boy's prodigious memory. Consequently when his father brought home an eighth size violin for him, playing the instrument became as natural as breathing to Joe. There was no holding him after that. Six months of lessons and a first concert convinced both father and teacher that the boy was a "wunderkind."

When he was six years old he was taken to the Institute of Musical Art to study under Franz Kneisel, the teacher of many prominent violinists and the head of the famous quartet bearing his name.

Unlike other musical prodigies, many of whom have fallen by the wayside, Joseph Fuchs had a wise father and a very cautious teacher. "What counts with an artist," Prof. Kneisel cautioned his pupil, "is what you are after twenty-five."

And to the boy's father he said: "I believe the boy has an extraordinary talent, but I insist that he be given a thorough musical training. Start pushing him now on the concert stage and I cannot take the responsibility for his development as an artist."

For religiously heeding the advice of his teacher, Joseph Fuchs can today point to his success as a concert artist. Regarded by many as one of the foremost violinists in the country, his first Town Hall recital in 1943 was unanimously greeted by rave notices from New York's leading critics. "A dream of virtuosity and musicianship," "exceptional virtuoso," "a great master of his instrument," were the superlatives heaped on the artist.

In subsequent New York recitals and with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in 1944 and 1946 Fuchs was again hailed by all the critics. Virgil Thomson of the New York Herald-Tribune summed up the opinion of all critics by stating in January 1946 ". . . At its best his work is unequalled by any among the violin players of our day."

Born in New York City, Joseph Fuchs is the oldest of five children, of whom two others besides himself have distinguished themselves in the musical world.

On his graduation from the Institute of Musical Art at seventeen years of age, he won the Morris Loeb prize of one thousand dollars. Europe was then the mecca of musicians and Joseph Fuchs couldn't wait until he had completed his studies in order that he might follow his colleagues. He promptly turned his prize money into a round trip ticket and left on the next boat for Europe.

His original plan to study with one of the German masters was changed into a concert tour throughout Germany and Austria where he was acclaimed by the critics. Today Mr. Fuchs is pointed out as one of the few outstanding musicians in the country who have been exclusively American trained.

Returning to America, Joseph Fuchs was offered the post of concert master with the Cleveland Symphony orchestra, a post which he filled with great distinction for thirteen years. Not content with his achievement of concertmaster of the Cleveland orchestra, Mr. Fuchs appeared regularly in the role of soloist. His popularity as a violin virtuoso grew so steadily that he had to choose between a career as an orchestra man and that of a concert soloist. He made the decision in favor of the latter.
