School Taken To Children Bound By Bodily Handicaps

CHARLESTON, W. Va.—At least 337 boys and girls in West Virginia dislike school vacations. They are the "homebodies" who get their learning in small doses from traveling teachers.

Infantile paralysis, heart trouble, whatever the cause, they're too sick to go to school. But their illness is physical, not mental. Their eagerness to learn is governed only by their physical strength.

That's the story told by H. Cliff Hamilton, supervisor of the state division of elementary schools. Taking school to children who are unable to attend classes is a growing thing throughout the United States. It is a cooperative project of state and counties, limited at present only by the amount of money available. Last year there was $25,000. This year, there was $40,000. More could be used, Hamilton says. The state supplies the money. The counties supply the teachers.

For some of the stronger boys and girls the teacher may arrive twice a week, an hour at a time. For others, it may be half an hour, four times weekly. The controlling factor is the strength of the child. The lessons may be those of the first grade or of the senior year of high school.

Hamilton says "homework" must not be such as to overtax a child's strength, despite the desire of the youngsters for bigger and bigger assignments. "Tests," with their attendant tension must be kept to a minimum. But most of the homebodies who recover sufficiently to attend regular classes find they are abreast of the work.

Of the 123 teachers, 12 are full-time and 111 are part-time. The full-timers may have 12 youngsters under their supervision. The part-timers have one or two in the neighborhood.

Even with increased appropriations this year, it was necessary to say "no" to some applicants for the second semester, Hamilton says. But the per capita cost is less than for youngsters in regular classes.

She gets the best service from our party line by following the five golden rules for party line neighbors. Betcha you can, too.

party-line pointers

Space your calls instead of making a whole series of them...and talk only as long as necessary.

If yours is an emergency call and the line is in use, explain the circumstances to the person using the line.

If you are calling from a dial telephone, always make certain the line is clear before you dial.

When the children use the telephone, ask them to be considerate, too.

Replace the receiver properly when you finish your call.

Thank you!
