Roseburg-Portland Phone Circuits To Be Increased by 6

Making use of coaxial tubes for the first time in Oregon, six additional long distance telephone circuits will be provided between Roseburg and Portland this week.

R. J. Henwood, manager of the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company here, said two circuits will be placed in service Monday and four more will be added by Wednesday.

Addition of the coaxial channels will increase long distance circuits between the two points to a total of 17.

Between Roseburg and Eugene, Henwood explained, calls will travel over wire conductors in the newly laid coaxial cable. From Eugene into Portland a pair of copper coaxial tubes, potentially capable of handling some 600 simultaneous conversations, has been equipped to provide the initial six circuits.

Although this will mark the first time the coaxial tubes themselves have been used in Oregon, Henwood said some wire conductors in the cable were placed in service early this spring to supplement long distance lines between Roseburg and Eugene.

Additional circuits in the coaxial cable, which extends from Portland to Sacramento, will be placed in service in the coming weeks as testing is completed.
