Electric Nerve' Aids Polio Victims

A new "electrical nerve," which acts as a substitute for human nerves affected by infantile or other paralysis, is demonstrated at the first international polio conference in New York. The device generates mild electric currents which replace lost nerves. They cause muscles to tense, swell and relax the same as they do in mild exercise. This helps to restore limbs wasted by polio. The "electric" nerve was developed by General Electric engineers and the G-E X-ray corporation.
