

Electronic Eye Devised for Many Industrial Tasks

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 14.—(AP)—An electronic eye system, a civilian version of a model used to pilot wartime guided missiles, was previewed here yesterday and its makers predict it will perform countless tasks in industry.

Called Vericon, the system consists basically of three portable units, a camera, a power generator and a 7 1/2 by 5 7/8 inch screen. Each of the units fits into a suitcase-sized box.

It differs from conventional television in that images are sent from camera to screen over wires, instead of broadcast. The units plug into a wall socket and are ready for operation.

The system was developed by the Remington Rand laboratory of advanced research at Norwalk, Conn. Now ready to be marketed, at $7,500 without extras, the eye was developed during the war.

Until recently the Army had a monopoly on its use. It served as a seeing eye for guided missiles in experiments. It also has been used in avoiding risks from live bombs.

The camera is focused on a robot machine which removes the sensitive fuse. Six thousand feet away the operation is observed on the screen. If the bomb explodes a camera is the casualty instead of a human life.

An inkling of some of Vericon's commercial uses was given by William A. Norvell of Remington Rand who will demonstrate it to business men on a nationwide tour.

"Any business that requires rapid transmission of records, messages or any documents can use it," he said. "A bank teller could hold a check before a camera while a file clerk in another room verified it from a screen."

As many as 10 screens may be hooked up to one camera. Thus several offices in a building could be wired into a circuit.

Norvell says the television and motion picture industries have shown particular interest. Vericon could be used for auditions, rehearsals or even screen tests, he believes.

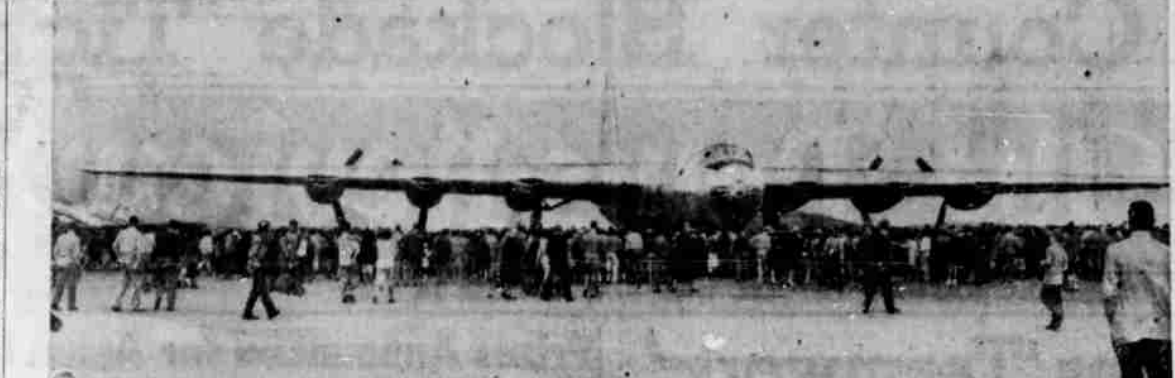

Police departments expect to use it to view suspects in off-guard moments. Educators foresee one lecturer's image being flashed to a dozen classrooms at once.

Soviet Aggression Is Denounced By Canadian Labor

TORONTO, Oct. 14.—(AP)—The Canadian Congress of Labor (C.C.O.) is on record with a denunciation of Russian aggression.

Delegates voted by a margin of about 7 to 1 to write a stiffly worded foreign policy resolution into the program being drafted at the annual convention of the congress.

The resolution condemned "the totalitarian activities in Soviet Russia and her satellite nations" and the blockade of Berlin.

(A hardening of policy toward Communism was reported shaping up in the convention of another major labor organization, the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada (A.F.L.), in Victoria B. C., Convention. Sources there said the executive committee was preparing a resolution, expected to be adopted, actively condemning Communists in the Canadian Labor movement.)

A minority headed by 54 representatives of the United Electrical Workers objected to the denunciation of Russia. The electrical workers termed the Marshall plan "imperialist aggression."

PORTLAND, Oct. 14.—(AP)—A YMCA international leader reports concern for juveniles in Europe and Asia who he said have "no place to go except to hell."

Eugene E. Barnett, general secretary of the International YMCA Committee, said moral values must be bolstered among youth of war ravaged nations. He said the "Y" is now shared by more nations than before the war, but that many more must be established.

About 600,000 cars from other states visited Oregon this year. There were cars from every state, but 51 per cent of them were from California. Washington was second, Illinois third, and Nebraska, Idaho and Kansas followed in that order.

The Tourist Bureau said the drop in tourist business was caused by the high cost of living and tightening of purse strings, asserting Oregon's downward trend was similar to the national drop in tourist business.

The Columbia River flood last June caused a 29 per cent drop in tourist business for the month. The Bureau said it would begin its 1949 advertising campaign in November in national magazines and newspapers.

Oregon's Tourist Business in 1948 Under 1947 Figure

SALEM, Ore., Oct. 14.—(AP)—Oregon's 1948 tourist business was worth $92,000,000, or 12 per cent below the 1947 record figure.

The State Highway Commission announced the figures after a survey which included asking questions of many tourists.

The 1948 figure, second largest on record, is almost double the pre-war estimates.

The average tourist this year spent $3.35 a day, compared with $3.91 in 1947, and $6.21 in 1946. Each out-of-state car represented $116.65 in spending. Based on an average load of 3.07 passengers and a week's stay in Oregon.
