Successful War On Berry Pests Recorded by OSC

Five years ago last summer the red raspberry crop of western Oregon was partially ruined by an infestation of the oblique-banded leaf roller which threatened to wreck the industry unless controlled.

Quick action by the War Food Administration in releasing enough of the then newly developed DDT to the Oregon experiment station for test purposes resulted in satisfactory control.

the next season and the development of spray practices that have prevented any serious losses ever since.

A complete technical report on the work of the experiment station on this problem has just been issued as technical bulletin No. 13 written by Joe Schuh, former entomologist at the station, and Dr. Don C. Mote, head of the entomology department. Previous progress reports had been issued for guidance of growers.

The pest is common throughout the Willamette valley, the authors point out, even though it has never occurred in serious numbers except on red raspberries. Although its leaf-rolling habits serve to stunt new cane growth, its chief damage is caused by the habit of the larvae in getting into the cups of the raspberries from where they are so difficult to dislodge that they ruin the sale or use of the fruit. Parasites Prey on Moths.

The adult moths, whose wings are marked by oblique dark bands as the name implies, fly mostly at twilight. They hide on the under side of leaves and when flushed dart quickly to another hiding place.

Parasites play an important role in holding this insect in check under normal conditions. The entomologists found 29 different parasites preying on it, 21 of which are considered beneficial while eight are also parasites of more effective parasites. Commercial raspberry growers now follow a standard spray or dusting schedule with DDT, applied usually between May 1 and 15. As most hibernating worms live over on old canes, good cultural control consists of removing and burning these canes not earlier than Nov. 1 nor later than March 1.

Derrick Digging Gravel In Mill Creek Area

Umpqua River Navigation Co.'s war surplus derrick, mounted on a steel barge, is now being used for digging gravel in the Umpqua River near Mill Creek, replacing an old steam-powered digger used for that work for the past several years.

The war surplus rig is diesel-powered, both on the derrick and on the swing mechanism, and is proving to be an exceptionally fine piece of equipment for this type of work.

Ed Marks of Reedsport is operating it. Until put to this use recently, the derrick was used for general work on the river, repairing dikes, digging channels, etc.

Silversides Entering Coast Lakes to Spawn

Reports from the various lakes along the coast indicate that large numbers of silverside salmon are getting up the outlets to the lakes, and on into the smaller streams for spawning purposes.

Heavy rains in the past few weeks have raised the lakes and deepened their outlets into the ocean to such an extent that the salmon can easily cross the sand beaches.
