By JAMES THRASHER

It's probably pointless to talk about President Truman's compulsory health insurance program, since everybody in the know seems to have killed it off in advance. But after last November's election you can't be too sure about any sure thing. So maybe the legislation should be given an outside chance of being considered.

election you can't be too sure about any sure thing. So maybe the legislation should be given an outside chance of being considered.

A bill to set up this program has been kicking around in Congress for quite a few years, and Mr. Truman has been pushing it since he took office. It has aroused a great deal of heat from both sides. Now it might be well if there were a little more light on the subject.

Enough people have shuddered at the mention of "socialized medicine" and stopped thinking right there. Enough hard names have been thrown at the American Medical Association. Enough exagerated claims have been made by both sides. No more of that is needed.

Congress might better start working from the one big point of general agreement: Better health service and medical care working from the one big point of general agreement: Better health service and medical care.
