Power Development In Area Of Columbia River Topic Of Movie Shown To Kiwanians

Power development of the Columbia River, and the vast potential supply of unharnessed horsepower were shown in a motion picture, "The Columbia," produced by Bonneville Power Administration and exhibited by Loren A. Moore, engineer, at Tuesday's Kiwanis Club meeting.

The picture traced the history of the founding of the Northwest from the time of President Thomas Jefferson and the Lewis and Clark expedition; on through the early 1930 depression days, the coming of transient labor, the dust bowl refugees, and lastly the people brought here by the war. In the Pacific Northwest alone remained the power necessary to run the industries needed for the war, and soon the entire supply of Bonneville and Grand Coulee Dams, formerly termed "white elephants," was turned to war uses.

But still this power is insufficient, the picture pointed out, and further dams on the tributaries are needed to prevent such floods as that which destroyed Vancouver. The great potentials of lumbering, aluminum and now atomic development are the industries of the Northwest, which can be further developed with added power, Moore pointed out. Vast acreages of semi-arid lands in Eastern Oregon and Washington can be made productive through irrigation. As yet, the Columbia is but one-tenth developed. Thirty million horsepower remains and is obtainable through construction of other dams now proposed.

Five members of Springfield's newly organized Kiwanis Club, headed by Ferrol Iles, formerly of Roseburg and son of Mr. and Mrs. Story Iles, visited the club. They brought with them a traveling gavel, which had been presented them by the Eugene club. Others from Springfield were J. C. Cook, Lloyd Ardinger, Ralph Nichols and Ed Laksman.

Frank Voyt, "Opportunity" bond sales chairman, reported every member of the Roseburg Kiwanis Club has purchased one or more bonds, to become the first in the city to reach the 100 percent mark.

City Manager M. W. Slankard, a visitor, spoke briefly on the swimming pool, and thanked the members for their part in the pool's promotion.
