Lodge Pole Pine Goes Into Lumber Manufacture

OMAK, Wash. — (AP) — An Omak lumber company is making lumber from trees previously regarded usable only as orchard props.

The new source of lumber is the lodge pole pine, a tree that seldom grows to more than six inches in diameter. A new mill developed at the Biles-Coleman Lumber Company in Omak saws and planes the thin pines. Since the mill was put in operation, 20,000 feet of lumber have been turned out daily.

The new lumber will go into caskets and apple boxes. The Biles-Coleman process is to be the first large-scale attempt to utilize lodge poles as lumber.

Morse Proposes Cherry Buyers Increase Price

WASHINGTON, June 20.—(AP) — Senator Morse (R-Ore.) accused Eastern cherry buyers last week of taking "unwarranted advantage" of an "unfounded rumor" to force down cherry prices in the Pacific Northwest.

He broke into a debate on labor legislation to read letters he exchanged with the State Department. Morse said he was "satisfied there is absolutely no basis" for the report that a 50 percent cut in the tariff on Italian and French cherries is being considered, or that such action would flood the market with foreign cherries.

He proposed that buyers raise the price. He suggested that, if there is no other way, they make the price higher in case no tariff cut is made and lower—on a sliding scale—if there is a reduction.

He said such a plan should "call the bluff" of the buyers. The State Department declined to tell Morse how negotiations on reciprocal trade matters are proceeding at Anney, France. He said the policy of the Department is never to divulge any information concerning any product that is under consideration.

Cherries were on the list of products to be discussed, the Department said. It added that the record of handling of the trade negotiations in the last 15 years "does not support the claims of eastern buyers of Oregon cherries that the market will be flooded with Italian cherries as a result of possible concessions at Anney."

The Department said there is "no basis for the representations made by eastern buyers to Oregon cherry growers that they cannot pay more than 4 1/2 to 5 cents a pound because of the threatened 50 percent cut in tariff."

Learning To Fight Forest Fires Not Easy Course, Applicants Discovering

SALEM, Ore.—(AP)—About 1,000 young men, who spend the summer looking for and fighting forest fires, are learning how to do it the hard way.

Most of them are college students. Every year each firefighter has to attend one of a series of 14 schools held by the State Forestry Department in the forested areas of the state.

The schools last three days each. And they are rugged. The training comes as close to actual fire fighting as the 30-odd instructors can make it.

The instructors even set fires, and let the trainees find them and put them out.

And to train them in how to read a compass, the instructors enclose a small area of forest land with long streamers of white tissue paper. Then they let the trainees find the area by compass reading.

The courses have been given for more than 10 years. Some of the trainees have worked during the summer for several years, but they have to take the course every year.

They also learn how to mop up fires, how to be a lookout, and how to handle fire lines.

The Forestry Department says the system works much better than the old system when the Department used to get pick-up crews from the skidroads of Portland to fight fires after they break out.

The instructors are taught a lot of fun thinking up new ideas and tricks to play on the trainees to keep them alert, it isn't all beer and skittles for them. The instructors have to go to school every year, too.

The instructors are taught by Don Maus, state training officer for the Department. He bosses the whole training plan. The trainees are trained both as individual fighters and as crews.
