Castaway Experience Told By Bruce Elliott; Boat Is Beached On Winchester Bay

Being a castaway is certainly not the most pleasant way of spending one's time, says Bruce Elliott. He ought to know. He was a castaway for six hours on the cold, windy beach of Win-chester Bay, after his boat was blown ashore.

chester Bay, after his boat was blown ashore. But being a castaway was only part of an interesting, if not hazardous and unpleasant, ex-perience of the local sportsman and Penney Store manager last Saturday. It might as well have been Friday the 13th, for all his unlucky breaks, he indicated. Elliott's story goes back to his long winter and spring prepara-tion for a boating and fishing trip on Winchester Bay, With boat and equipment in fine or-der, he and his wife headed coastward.

der, he and his wife headed coastward. Hunts Deep Water Arriving at Winchester Bay, they pitched their tent, and El-liott attempted to find a place to launch his boat. The tide be-ing out forced him to drive to deep water at Gardiner. He fig-ured he could make it down the bay in about three hours. He traveled a couple hours on-ly to learn he was in the wrong estuary and that it was necessary to return and go through Reeds-port to reach his destination. He attempted to follow a larger but much older "crate" down the bay, but sound his own late model, but smaller craft, couldn't keep up.

but found his own late model, but smaller craft, couldn't keep up. Soon he found himself going over a shallow sand bar, and he nearly burned out his clutch. He was still able to navigate under a considerable handicap. Wind Severe To add to his difficulty the wind began blowing more and ized the wind could blow so hard, he said. Finally his motor died, and he was blown by the severe wind onto the sandy beach. Here he waited more than six hours, attempting without avail to attract attention of passing boats. He started to walk out on some pilling over the river, but the wind blew him off into the water. Wet and extremely cold, he went back to his boat and started to "dig in" for the night. Finally he attracted the at-tention of some fishermen, who, after some persuading and "cross-ing of their palm," towed him back toward Reedsport. Along the way they met the Coast Guard boat, whom his wife had sent out to look for him. In all his confusion Eilliott said some air cushions on the
