

Cement For Dam Movement Draws Heavy Protest

PORTLAND—(AP)—Movement of more than a million barrels of cement from Portland to Detroit damsite on the north Santiam river was argued here Saturday and decision was reserved.

The question was: Should a permit be granted to Miles & Sons trucking service, Merced, Calif., to truck the cement?

In opposition were railroad interests, who would like the business and the city of Salem which doesn't want the big trucks to jam traffic through the city.

Pat L. Nolet, representing the trucking firm, said 20 truck-trailer combinations would be used in the hauling. A total of some 30 to 40 round trips daily on a 24-hour schedule are contemplated, starting in June, 1950, and extending to May, 1952. Holiday and Sunday hauling is not planned but may be necessary at times to keep up with pouring schedules.

He said it was believed Salem could be bypassed by routing trucks on Lancaster drive. Salem's objections were withdrawn on that basis.

At Salem, County Judge Grant Murphy said use of Lancaster drive had not been brought up officially. He indicated he did not look on it with favor.

R. H. Ballock, state highway engineer, said the truck hauling would be hard on the highways.

Alfred Corbett, speaking for the Southern Pacific, Northern Pacific and Pacific Northwest Freight bureaus, asked that the trucking permit application be dismissed. The railroad brotherhood's legislative League of Oregon also voiced opposition to truck use.

However, Sam Moore, traffic manager of Permanent Cement Co., a Kaiser firm, said the Southern Pacific service would not meet the need. The rail terminal is a mile and a half from the damsite, he said. If cement were pumped or blown across the river and up some 400 or 500 feet, the problem would be met only in part. A later move of the terminal would put it three miles from the dam, he said.

Interstate Commerce Commission and Oregon Public Utilities commission representatives, who heard the speakers, will receive briefs to Oct. 10.
