Scientists Underpaid in Britain, Charge Made

LONDON, Oct. 4.—(AP)—An appeal to young scientists to get into the British government's atomic research service was denounced Monday as a "stunt" to conceal the fact that scientists are poorly paid.

The denunciation came from the Institution of Professional Civil Servants. It issued a statement saying that a "stunt recruitment of scientists for atomic development" is necessary because the pay of research workers is so low.

The supply ministry announced Sunday that salaries of £500 to £900 ($1.40 to $2,320) a year are being offered to qualified men and women chemists and physicists to work in unexplored fields of atomic research.

The opal is greatly admired because of the remarkable beauty of its changing color. It has been likened to a rainbow and in ancient times was regarded with superstitious awe.

Hungarian opals ruled supreme up to the closing years of the Nineteenth Century. Since then opals have been discovered in Australia. Here also the famous black opals were found which have added still more variety to this desirable gem.
